The Canadian Suspects.

HARD FARE IN A FILTHY DUNGEON.

Loudon, Aug. 9.—Cornelius and Matthew Flaherty who, on a recent visit to Ireland, were captured by the Irish police and locked up on suspicion of being implicated in the murder of Lord Cavendish and Mr. Burke, have given a full description of their experience as Canadian suspects. Cornelius, in an interview, says:—On the afternoon of the 11th July, shortly after having finished dinner, we were sitting comfortably in a room in the house of our aunt at Ballyduff, when we were rather surprised to see three officers step into the house. One of them walked up to each of us and tapped us on the shoulder, saying, "You're my prisoner in the Queen's name." This was about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of a Tuesday, and we asked the cause of our arrest, but no reason was given. We were then taken to Ballybunoin, and kept in custody until 11:30 in the evening, when they came to take us away again. I (Cornelius) objected to go out at that late hour on account of Mat's delicate health, but they paid no attention to what we said, and we were compelled to go to Listowel, some nine miles away. On reaching that place we were lodged in the police station, where they wanted to lock me in the cell, but Mat said he would accompany me, and so they let me stop in an outer room. We were kept here until one o'clock on the following afternoon, when we were taken upstairs to the office of Mr. Massie, the magistrate. There was no examination at all, but the magistrate told us we were remanded for eight days until they could get further evidence of our being concerned in the murder of Cavendish and Burke. Then we produced the certificates given to us before we left this city by Mayor Meredith, and having the seal of the city of London, but they said any one could write that, sneered at the papers, and hardly looked at the credentials. They next marched us off to Tralee gaol, which we found in a dirty filthy condition. The fare was very poor, and the dishes seemed not to have been cleaned for a long time. When the doors of the prisoners' cells were opened the stench was terrible, and could hardly be borne at first. The tea they gave us was served in a dirty tin, and was so greasy and bad that it served the purposes of both physic and medicine. The first time I drank it I became sick, and was ill for three days from the effects of drinking the stuff. We were kept in confinement from Tuesday until the following Friday, when we were released, and the officers said they were sorry to cause us so much trouble, but we told them if they had examined our papers there would have been no need for the trouble.

After our release we enjoyed a very good time with our friends. It had been our intention to visit nearly al the points of interest in Ireland, and also to go to England, but we were afraid to leave the place where we were for fear that we might be arrested again on some other charge without foundation. So we could not go anywhere until we made up our minds to come home, and we left Ireland on the 28th ult., disgusted with the way we had been used in our native land. The soldiers and constables are themselves the cause of all the trouble in Ireland, and no stranger travelling there is safe from imprisonment."

Baalbic.

This is, probably, one of the oldest places of worship in Syria, and the present ruins mark the site of an old Phœnician temple consecrated to Baal, or the worship of the sun. And yet there are fewer places of note of which we have so little information. The structures now in ruins were certainly built toward the close of the third Christian century, begun, probably by the Roman Emperor, Septimus Severus, and completed by Antonius Pius. There is, on an elevated platform of masonry, the ruins of a great temple—whether a temple of Jupiter or a pantheon, one can hardly say—with two courts and a portico, and a smaller temple, generally known as the Temple of the Sun. The entire series seem to be part of one design, and of the same style of architecture, a Romanized Corinthian. The work is ornate beyond anything of so great extent elsewhere, and the buildings must have been strikingly beautiful, as well as imposing on account of their size and extent. The entire platform was nearly, if not quite, 1,000 feet in length, consisting of a portico, an outer hexagonal court, a rectangular court, nearly square and finally the temple. Of the last only six columns are standing, on the central portion of the south side. They are sixty feet high, surmounted by an architrave and frieze seventeen feet high. The Temple of the Sun, on a lower part of the platform, and south of the structure already named, is in a much better state of preservation. It was smaller in size, but the architectural work is much more elaborate. Of the 46 columns, a considerable number are still standing. They are 46 feet high, with an unusually high entablature and frieze. The doorway and the inside of the temple are exceedingly elaborate in carvings. South-east from these temples is a beautiful small semi-circular temple, probably dedicated to Venus. The court of the great temple contains the ruins of a Christian church, erected by Theodosius the Great, who, it is said destroyed the great temple. One is struck with astonishment in looking at the massiveness of the stones of which these buildings are constructed. The great columns are only in three pieces each. The base and capitals of the columns, and the great stones above the capitals are so large that we must confess that the builders had facilities for moving and elevating masses of stone which we do not possess. But still greater astonishment must be expressed at the size of the great stones on the north and west foundations of the platform of the great temple. There are nine stones about thirty feet long and ten feet thick on the north side; on the west side three, each fourteen feet high, respectively, sixty-four, sixty-three and a half, and sixty two feet long. And in a quarry half a mile or more away, is one ready for transportation, seventy one feet long, fourteen feet big, and thirteen feet wide. But, we can hardly attribute this massive work to the Romans. It must have belonged to an earlier temple probably a thousand years older. A veil of mystery remains over these ruins, which possibly may never be removed.—Central Christian Advocate.

One of the free public wells for the city of Winnipeg has been completed. It stands at the corner of Common and May streets. Its total depth is 82 feet and 5 inches, 40 feet of this being through the solid granite. A stream of water was struck at the depth of 50 feet, and a second and more abundant one at 80 feet. Iron tubing five inches in diameter has been sunk to the rock. The water is considered of good quality and of sufficient abundance in quantity. It rises to within about eight feet of the ground surface. Four similar wells are to be sunk.
