About this time, Constantino Valsassina, a daring smuggler, and famous hunter of the mountains, whose name was well known as a desperado in all the country round courageous, and handsome. The hitherto cold and impassive heart of the village beauty was stirred to its depths, and she determined that, come what might, she would wed no other than this one hero, this Napoleon of the forests. No, he would not give credit to the idea that his pure and stainless Rosa could be enamored of a desperado, after having refused the offers of so many respectable young men, any one of whom would have made her a good and suitable husband. He either could not or would not entertain such an unlikely and humiliating idea. Once he mentioned the subject to his daughter who laughed merrily at the tale, and both then turned the whole affair into jest and ridicule.

But one evening when Manilla passed the border with his smuggler's sack on his shoulders, the guard, who had hitherto (thanks to the charms of his daughter) feigned not to perceive him, fired at once, and was near wounding the old man. The ball pierced the bag, but hastily throwing down his burden, he luckily had time to escape. But what an awakening from his false dream of security! He doubted no more the tale of his daughter's disobedience, but with his habitual caution, he kept his own counsel, breathing not a word of his suspicions to Rosa, for he wished to asce .tain the bitter truth for himself, determined that when he had done so his vengeance should be swift and certain.

The two lovers, entirely engrossed by their passion had gradually relaxed their habit of watchfulness, and having been so far fortunate in lulling the old man's auspicions, had become somewhat imprudent and careless. To surprise them in one of thing at last. The preachers will go crazy their stolen interviews was therefore an over it, and it will sell like hot cakes. It's casy task for the wild old smuggier.
