Unprincipled farries can be found who support them in this ridiculous claim.

In contradiction of this is the whole anatomical structure of the tail. Its angle of use is universal, as it is swung to any part of the body at the will of the horse. In order to do this, a thousand little muscles and sinews are required. The energy which calls these into play is represented by a multitude of nerve fibers, while in the centre of the tail is the spinal.

The purchaser of a carriage horse in New York will not buy a docked horse except it be a high-bred hackney. He is afraid the horse will be second hand. A fine, green horse, fresh from the pastures of the country, is brought to his stables, and a farrier is summoned, who brings a charcoal furnace, sharp knives, ligatures and a sort of a plumbing kit with him. The horse is slung from the floor in a canvas hammock, so that his feet are lifted from the floor, and a fence is crowded close to his heels, to accomplished his object and has his man prevent him from hurting the gentleman down with his teeth in his throat. practical utility from the Western World, and it has in its turn opened up a commerce of the richest kind in things aesthetic. Science also, in which, if anything, we may claim to have shown a certain mastery, ha reaped no small advantage from the ori ginality of our eastern neighbors. Even sanitation has gained somewhat. Scrupulous cleanliness, it is well-known, is a Japanese virtue, and one which has arrived at a degree of excellence in practice unknown among ourselves. How many of our artisans are in the habit of daily changing their working clother? how many bathe daily the whole body? The answer may best be left in discreet obscurity. Yet these are among the common and habitus! privileges of every workman in the dominions of the Mikado. Many, indeed, bathe twice a day. In order to allow of this salutary practice almost every street possesses its public bath house. The bath, a warm one, measures about 5 feet by 8 feet, and is 3 feet deep. It is fed by a constant current of hot and one of cold water, and is continually replenished by fresh addi-tions. The rather plunges into it, remains immersed ten minutes or so, rubs himself with a towel, then has a general douche of warm water, which is fresh in each case, repeats the process, is finally dried, and goes home. The cost of thus cleansing the body is very small. That it is not altogether customed to use an entirely fresh supply of water on each occasion will admit. Still, the Japanese, with his douche basin, may well arrive at an excellant result in spite of his immerson in water, which, though clear, be rank unclearliness compared with the daily plunge and douche of laboring Japan. The provision of cheap public bath houses, with a sufficent supply of clean water is a dream of the sanitarian as yet unrealized in London, although the civic authorities in many of Great Britan's large towns, notably Glasgow, have already devoted much atention to this subject.
