the design of Maclise, the late Royal academician-after the paper has been first damped with water in the exhausted receiver of an air pump. Even the printing ink is of a special make, and is manufactured at the bank. Camparing a genuine with a spuris out note, one observes that the print on the latter is usually tinted with either blue or brown. On the real note it is a very deep shade of velvety black. The ink used in the plate printing is made of Frankfort black, which is composed of linseed oil and the charred husks and some other portions of Rhinish grapes. The notes are printed at the rate of 3,000 an hour on a Napier steam press, and the bank issues 9,000,000 of them a year, representing roughly about $1,500,000,000 in hard cach. Each note is distinguished from all others by the number and date added to the denomination, and any person possessing this information can at the bank ascertain to whom the note was issued, when it was issued, when it was returned to the bank and who presented it. The practice of splitting bank notes for fraudulent purposes has been prevented by the printed surface being alone made to receive the water mark. Only the faintest possible trace of it would be retained on the split of portion. Each note has thin, rough edges, uncut, not to be produced by any mode of cutting paper that is not made expressly for the purpose. In addition to the above precautions there are secrets connected with the preparation of the pulp from which the paper is made, chemical compounds being introduced at the time of manufacture, while the water marks are frequently varied and even the ink has
