The Irishman in modern times. To complete the picture of opening of this great port was a parade of the French Mediterranean fleet, conducted so quietly that it was hardly known outside f of France, and due, no doubt, to the fact that in opening it at all, the republic violated a direct promise made to Great Britain. For in the correspondence between the two governments which accompanied the French occupation of Tunis in 1881, France not only repeatedly promised not to permanently occupy the country, but at England's request, gave special assurances that Bizerta would not be converted into a military and naval port. In view of these pledges, it is not unnatural that the Paris government should carefully refrain from advertising the completion of the port, and dread the return to power of a British premier likely to demand compensation for the injury done to British interests in the construction of a naval stronghold on the British route to India, and if refused, to add it to the list of injuries for which payment will some day be exacted. It is true, of course, that the breaches of faith are by no means all on the French side, but it is, unfortunately, equally true that England can show the longer list of diplomatic grievances, and so is in better position to demand an accounting.

OUR EXPORT APPLE TRADE.

A Valuable Suggestion to the Canadian

Farmer and Fruit Grower. In the Glasgow Evening Citizen of a recent date there is a letter which contains a suggestion concerning the apple trade which ought not to be lost on the Canadian farmer and fruit grower. The writer, Mr. John Maclean, is evidently a very clearheaded and experienced business man. His suggestion is that the barrel be discarded as an apple-package, and replaced by three square wicker baskets, or crates, whose joint capacity is equal to that of one barrel. His reasons for this change are weighty, and are drawn from experience. The prime one is that the barrel is altogether too large for is called for, not merely for the extension style in the magazines and reviews, paying Apples, peaches, prunes, prunelles, raspberries and blueberries are used commonly in the dried form. All of them are wholesome and palatable. Of course much time is needed to prepare them so that they will "tempt both eye and palate," The apples and prunes require the addiion of lemon juice to give the needed acid. All of these fruits require long soaking and slow cooking, with the addition of sugar when nearly done if you wish to have them in perfection. Many, almost endless in fact are, the ways in which you can use these fruits, either alone or in combination; pies, puddings, cakes and sauces are made from them. Hygienically, of course you should serve all fruit in the simplest be used which are extremely wholesome and will tempt ofttimes an appetite which otherwise would take nothing. Many housekeepers still dry the windfall apples, sweet and sour, and thus have their own supply ready for spring. Blueberries are also prepared in the same way, although now the majority can them, a method, it seems to me, far preferable to the first. Dates and figs are usually classed under the dried fruits and they are by far the most important so far as the amount of nourishment is concerned. The ordinary fruits furnish us with a certain flavor and some laxative properties which render tors, after working over me to the best of them very important.
