The first and most important factor is he profit-producing herd. This secured, success is easy; without it, success is impossible. It is a fact that many cows do not, and cannot be made to pay for their keeping. Outside of localities where dairying is extensively engaged in, very few farmers have given attention in breeding to produce the dairy strain, and comparatively few have adopted dairy breeds. The ideal cow with many of our best farmers is a large, well-formed one, disposed to take on flesh and looks sleek, that will raise a calf and give a good flow of milk-the "general purpose" cow. Perhaps for general purposes such a cow is the proper thing, but for profit he general purpose cow is discarded, and the dairy breeds, in which the profit cow is he rule and not the exception, are adopted. Shorthorns are left for breeders of steers on the plains, and Holsteins to supply city milk wagons and condensing factories. The milk and slop can usually be fed to the growing pig to better advanage than to almost any other class of stock. But to maintain good health and thrift he should not have all of the neglects heaped upon him because he is a hog. He needs good treatment to make the most of him, and the more fully this is given the better. It is rather poor management that conclude: that a hog can thrive upon almost any kind of feed, provided he has a sufficient amount of it. Good wholesome, nutritions food is as essential to good growth and thrift with hogs as with any other class of stock. Of the seven to nine months needed to grow a hog for market, five, at least, can be spent to good advantage in the pasture fields. While, perhaps, a better grain in proportion to the amount of food sufficient can be received by feeding in a closed pen, the additional risk of disease will, in nearly

A few years' experience in dairying as a farm specialty has convinced me that few sources of revenue from the farm yield so am aware that a majority will disagree with me. Very many farmers assert that keeping cows more than to supply the family needs, does not pay. I attribute this shod manner in which the dairy is conducted. Those who keep but four or five cows generally make the product up at home, and sell the surplus at the village stores. Those who keep more than that neighboring creamery. In the first case the farmer seldom knows what the surplus in either case are not generally satisfactory. But dairying for profit requires knowledge of the business, facilities and conditions for conducting it, and care in its management-the simple conditions of success in
