MARRIAGE EXTRAORDINARY

THE HOME MARKETS FOR CHEESE.
 There has been considerable talk during the past year or two in reference to the development of our home market for cheese. The agitation along this line has been more noticeable since cheese has taken the drop in prices. Before that time the prices for cheese for export had been good for a number of years, and the local market was largely looked upon only as a dumping ground for all cheese that was not considered of fine enough quality to send to the English consumer, since the depression in prices, however, leading dairymen have been looking to the home market as an outlet for some of our fine cheddar cheese.

Comparatively little of our cheese is consumed in Canada. Our people only used it as a kind of relish, and not at all as a staple article of food. We are in no sense of the term a cheese-eating people. True, we have not the great centres of population that the mother country has, comprised of the working and middle classes, who have to use wholesome, substantial, and economical foods in order to sustain them when at work, and which can be had at the lowest possible cost; but we have in Canada a large agricultural class, whose outdoor employment compels them to take nutritious foods, and, besides, in our cities and towns a large class of workmen who are compelled to live as economically as possible. There appears, therefore, to be considerable room for, and for inducing our people to become greater consumers of that nutritious article of food than they are.
