Smith did as he was requested. He found on a visit to Cowan that John Davey was dead, but John's son took him to the house of another brother, William. Smith told William that he had met his brother Thomas in America, and, that he was well and prospering. The information was so surprising to William that his disbelief was expressed in an emphatic manner. "You are a liar," he said to Smith, "and the man who says he is my brother is an imposter. Why our Tom has been dead

Smith showed Tom the letter in his brother's handwriting, and convinced him of the truth of what he had said. Then William took Smith to the home of Thomas's wife, and there a com-

After her husband's departure Mrs. Davey had written regularly to him at Pottsville, and his letters in reply had always been of the most affectionate nature. Then they ceased altogether, without any explanation. After waiting for five years to hear from him, several letters having been returned unopened, it was decided that he had died, and the wife married Briggs, a widower, who had a son named John. Edward Davey, the son whom Thomas had left behind died at an early age, leaving Mrs. Davey only her daughter, Elizabeth, to comfort her in her sorrow. After the marriage of Mrs. Davey to Briggs the two children by their former marriages were brought to live with the couple, and soon there sprang up an attachment between them, which terminated in THEIR MARRIAGE.

When five years ago John Briggs died, his widow as she was supposed to be, went to live with her daughter and step-son-in-law. This was the condition of affairs that Smith found when he
