Japan's total exports and imports, including bullion reached $296,000,000 in 1895, reckoned in silver, whereas just ten years earlier they had been only $77,000,000, that amount thus being nearly quadrupled. The increase of 1895 over 1894 was about $30,000,000. The enormous increase in the exports tom of a pan, and pour boiling water of textiles is due to the fact that "Japan in two or three inches deep and they is a nation of weavers. The ex- tention. port of cotton cloth probably does not yet exceed $5,000,000; but last year the value of the silk and cotton cloth produced in Japan, including kimono stuff and obi fabric, was $71,350,747. Cottoo spinning in 1889 gave employment to only 5,394 women and 2,539 men, but in 1895 to over 30,000 women and 10,000 men. China and Japan are both striving for the cotton trade of Asia, mills going up rapidly both in Osaka and While Osaka is the centre of the cotton-yarn industry, Nagoya is that of cotton cloth manufacture. A mighty city is growing up at the head of the Inland Seas, and within the space of 100 miles north and south. Osaka and the port of Kobe have a population of over 16,000,000 to draw upon for a supply of inexpensive labor. The road by water is short thence to China, and it is only a few days to Vladivostok, where the Siberian railroad, when completed,

Her readiness to turn to any new industry was shown by the sudden efflux of Japanese umbrellas, of which about 2,000,000 were exported in 1894, mostly to China. In the rug district of Sakaye and the matting district of Okayama, the schools, says Mr. Porter, are depopulated to find children for those manufactures. The wages of the little workers range from about one cent to three cents per day, and "the pay for adults of both sexes, in these districts, and in all the textile trades, rarely exceeds ten cents, American money." The export of rugs and matting in 1893 was $2,115,330, and last year $5,079,271.

JAPAN'S ENTERPRISE is further shown by her investments of capital since the war with China, either in new enterprises or in the en-largement of old ones. The number of industrial establishments including industrial establishments including mills, mining, electric, and other works thus newly established or else increased in capital, is put by Mr. Porter at 187, with $86,596,600 capital, reckoned in silver dollars; the number of commercial companies, including insurance, exchange, shipbuilding and others, at 126, with $63,647,000; the banks at 187, with $107,995,000; the railroad companies at 80, "having permission of Government to build," with 125 more projected, and
