But when Baron de Kallay, a Hungarian, who had been successively a soldier, an author and editor, a legislator, an official of the Austrian foreign office, and secretary of state, at the command of the emperor began his reign there in 1882 the garden spot had long been given over to anarchy. It had passed under Austrian administration as the result of the Russo-Turkish war of 1878, and Baron de Kallay received it from the Austrain troops who had enforced order following the Turkish evacuationa province without roads, trade, popular education, in short, with nothing save internal strife, famine and bloodshed. Under the Turks government had been maintained only to the extent of forcibly collecting exorbitant taxes and quartering soldiers upon the villagers, oppression which the Christians resented by savage reprisals, the provinces being thus kept in a wallow of horses through two summers with only want and crime.

a chaos seemed a well-nigh hopeless one, but the ambition of Baron de Kallay was to make of the united provinces the model state of the Balkan peninsula, an example of the methods by which the mergence of the life of the East and the West can best be effected. Realizing the difficulty of imposing western institutions upon the diverse Oriental tribes composing the population, and finding much of the old Turkish law excellent in principle, he simply added to it so much of western jurisprudence as was necessary, and then enforced it with an iron hand. The result of the experiment has been little less than marvellous, the province within thirteen years having been made as safe as a city street, an excellent system of popular education put into operation, courts of justice re-established ine them occasionally, and if any beards been to my wife. She had been a great and purified roads, railways and public buildings built, and an efficient gendarmerie organized. Despite the free expenditure of money in internal development, the annual budget now shows a surplus under diminished taxation, the population has increased nearly eighteen per cent., while their prosperity is proven by the large exports of horses, cattle, sheep and pigs, and by the rapid purchase by the peasants of their holdings.
