place to a winning smile, and the stranger volubly indicated the right road, and then said laughingly in English: "But do you understand me?" "Yes, perfectly," replied Fraser; "and I wish my Spanish were as good as your English. Then punctilious words were ex-

"That fellow was looking after us." "Well, you were looking after him, or you would not have seen.-What do you mean by your first impressions?"

"I don't like the look of that fellow." "Insular prejudice."

"Don't care what it is; I don't like him, and I'm sure I never should .-Why, Horace, look there!"

Not twenty yards in front was the girl they had so lately met; and as Digby drew attention to her presence, he stopped and hastily picked up a twig of flowers such as he had seen her carrying, and which her despondent attitude suggested that she had dropped. For she was walking slowly on with her face buried in her handkerchief, evidently sobbing bitterly; and as they followed, she let others of the flowers she had gathered fall.

"Stop!" whispered Fraser hastily, as "Going to see if I can—"
Digby did not finish his sentence, for the girl had evidently heard the harsh whisper. She turned, gazing back at him in an affrighted way; and as they caught sight of the tearful convulsed face, she darted down a side-track, and
