A DEAD RECKONING.

CHAPTER XI.

No one spoke for a moment or two after Margery had blurted out her news. Then for the second time Karovsky said: "There is still one way of escape open to you."

"For me to personate you." "O monsieur!" cried Clara, a flash of hope leaping suddenly into her eyes. "Karovsky, are you mad?"

"Pardon, I think not; but one can never be quite sure. Listen! These men who are coming to arrest you are strangers to you, or rather you are a stranger to them; they have never set eyes on you before. I will answer to your name: I will go with them, and before they have time to discover their mistake, you will be far away."

"And the consequences to yourself?" "A few hours' detention-nothing more. Your English police know me not." Then he added with a shrug: "At once to struggle desperately to free himself, but all to no purpose. After a little time, however, he discovered that the chair in which he was bound moved on casters, and this discovery put an dea into his head such as would not have entered it under other circumstances. The room was lighted by a lamp on a low table, and to this table he managed by degrees to slide his chair, along the floor. Then setting his teeth hard, and stretching his arms to the fullest extent his bonds would allow of his doing, he held his wrists over the flame of the lamp, and kept them there unflinchingly till the outermost coil of the ligature which bound them was burnt through.

"And that is?"— said Gerald again. "Now, is the opportunity for Gerald to get away," said Clara. "The police may discover their mistake at any moment." Her hand was on the door, when suddenly there was a sound which caused all three to start and stare at each other with eyes full of terror. It was the sound of unfamiliar footsteps ascending the stairs. Mrs. Brooke shrank back as the door opened and George Crofton entered the room. "You!" she gasped.
