It is not always the proprietor who is at fault altogether. It is sometimes the case that one looking for work comes along and professing a knowledge of pruning is set to work to prune the roses and shrubs. It is strange that in nearly every case of this kind the pruner's idea of what is the proper way to prune is that all young shoots of the previous season's growth should be lopped off. This is sometimes done, leaving the shrub ball-shaped, at other times with a flat top. These notes are on the pruning of the rose, but it must not have the young shoots of last season's making out away, or there will be no flowers the coming As to roses, the pruning must depend entirely on what class they belong to. What are known as daily roses, which are those that flower all through the season, and embrace Teas, Bourbons, Chinas and Noisettes, and some hybrids, need close pruning. The flowers come from young shoots of the same season. Cut down almost to the ground, strong shoots will succeed, which will bear flowers on their ends. Not that they need such close cutting down as that, if the branches are cut down to half their length it will be found to answer very well. > its seedlings, climbing Teas and Noisettes come into this class. Of late years the Russian roses, known as Rugosa, have become well known. These are very hardy, and have given a desirable lot of seedlings of different colors. They do not need very much pruning, but should have a little. Very often a bush may be unshapely, and a pruning, to give it good shape, may be a great help to it. The old sweetbrier rose and the Austrian brier are valued in every garden. They need little pruning; neither does the beautiful hardy yellow one, dens, both because of their flowers and their having numerous red berries on
