The next morning Mr. Everett was jubilant. He had enjoyed a profound sleep, and was ready for any proposition that suggested open air, and the society of the Minturns. He was surprised to hear that Larry had breakfasted alone, and had left the hotel at seven o'clock punctually.

"The boy is thoroughly in earnest, he remarked to his wife, who waited rather impatiently for the wagon that was to take them to Mr. Minturn's house. Mrs. Everett was feverish with annoyance, anxiety and disappointment. Her husband's state of mind added to her irritability. That he should find rest stances was most provoking.
