Dear Mother:

The time has arrived again for me to write you a few lines. Things have been moving along at a very even gait and there is not much news, but I will do the best I can. We had some quite warm days since I wrote you last week, but the last two or three days have been nice and cool, and I imagine if you had been here you would have wanted a furnace fire or at least a toaster to keep you from having cold feet. To-day however, was warmer and might have been a little oppressive had it not been for the strong breeze that was blowing from the west. We have had no rain save one little shower since I wrote you last and everything is drying up. My corn is all shrivelled, and nothing in the garden looks well except the tomatoes, marrows and carrots. Our seeds are all up, but are making no progress. The raspberries have all dried on the stalks and it looks as though we will have little to can this year. I made arrangements however, with a Mr. Schultz, one of our Sunday students, to take us up sometime next week in his car to the blueberry fields to pick some blueberries. If this materializes we may have something in the canning line after all. Mr. Rumball came up Friday and made
