

the head of affairs in Canada during the troubled times through which we have so recently and safely passed.

I am not a hero worshiper, nor one who worships at the shrine of antiquity; but I do believe in the ultimate triumph of the Trinity of Principles before mentioned. Those principles are good not merely because they are ancient; but they have long endured because they are good; and when we, whether individuals or groups of individuals, lose sight of them we lose our souls.

During the forty years that have elapsed since first you entered parliament + have read with care every pronouncement made by you on any matter of national or international concern; and only twice in all those years have I felt inclined to disagree with you in any particular; and in one of those instances I felt that what you said was, under the circumstances, the best that could be said in the national interest.

Canada, in common with some other countries, is suffering from mass hysteria as a result of mass propaganda; and our present leaders are doing nothing to allay it; but rather to foment it. The present Federal leader of the Liberal Party is not a Laurier, nor a Laurier type of Catholic. In fact it is the opinion of many staunch Liberals that his speeches on international affairs sound like echoes of the voice of Rome. I cannot avoid feeling sorry for St. Laurent, and particularly for his family. There lives have been spent in the tranquillity of the court room, or the home, far removed from the turmoil of politics. The day is not far distant when those Tories who placed a halo about the head of St. Laurent, will replace it
