LOOKS WELL BUT LACKS FORCE.

Word from Chicago brings the news that, as a result of action taken there recently by representatives of the Poster Advertising Association, beginning with next year when new contracts go into effect, advertisements of spirituous liquors will disappear from a majority of the billboards in the United States, Canada, Cuba, Porto Rico and Hawaii, in which countries the Poster Advertising Association controls the billboards of 4,000 towns and cities. According to a resolution adopted by the Association it would appear that vinous and malt liquors will continue to be advertised.

This is another step in the movement for prohibition that is sweeping over the world. That a large amount of good will be accomplished by it is doubtful. Taken from the standpoint of morals the liquor advertisements are not so suggestive as those of various makes of lingerie scattered in the pages of the best class of magazines and from an artistic point of view a sketch of a white haired, distinguished clubman toasting the shadowy forms of the dear women in his memory on a lonely Christmas Eve or one of a table with a book, cigarette, pair of riding gloves and glass of beer is far beyond anything as yet printed with a new make of hosiery or underwear for its theme. It will be interesting to see whether the vinous and malt liquors will follow the ones condemned. The local and state authorities are largely responsible for the continuance of liquor advertisements in public places. When a state goes dry naturally the posters suggesting spirituous liquid refreshment follow suit. It seems to be largely a matter of business on the part of the Poster Advertising Association.

Prohibition is gaining ground with rapidity. That the soldiers may be better fitted to kill each other absinthe has become unpopular in France, vodka in Russia and whiskey in England. Instead of a man being allowed the right to drink himself to death he is kept in fine fettle that he may kill some other man. In this condition of things posters have no effect one way or the other. Where a country is at peace and the effort of the prohibitionists is to prevent crime, promote industry and decrease the rate in mortality the absence of liquor posters in a state still wet create slight comment but a party of jolly men full of good fellowship, partly natural and part acquired, is a live opposition advertisement that gathers strength in its progress.
