The Short Working Day

There are just two characteristics, the possession of which make a man successful, the lack of which keeps him down. Given brains, industry and thrift are the essentials to financial wellbeing. Lacking either or both of these qualifications a man need not expect to arrive. And it is industry and thrift that it seems to be the endeavor of the radical leaders in the present struggle of that body of men who work with their hands to eliminate. The demand of the short working day, six hours in some lines of work, twenty hours a week in some, they seem to think to be the royal road to munificence. They do not see that the long period of idleness each day and each week is not conducive to the improvement of the conditions against which they think they rebel.

No one who has reached a point of success in his business or professional enterprise has ever counted the number of the hours of the day that he has spent in the prosecution of his business affairs. More of this group of men work eighteen hours out of the twenty-four than work six, and all those who are able to discharge their day's business in the short business day have served their apprenticeship in the school of experience where the long day and hard work were the order of the day.

It requires a higher mental training to be able to use leisure profitably than for almost any other obligation that the good citizen must acknowledge. Eighteen hours out of the twenty-four left with no employment except the period for sleep and the daily meals offers a fertile field for mischief which those who are advocating such a reduction of the working day ought to take into their consideration. It is as serious a part of the labor problem as the working out of a system by which the rate of production necessary for the supplying of the demands of the whole public may be maintained.
