What A Bank Should Be

THE relation between a bank and its depositors is different from that between other lines of business and their customers. And a bank can be useful to its clients beyond the mere depositing, paying and lending money. A bank stands in confidential relation to its depositors. It has opportunities to help them and it has opportunities to take advantage of them. It becomes familiar with their financial transactions. It knows what deals they are planning and making. Not only their money, but their business secrets are in its hands for safekeeping. Further, the bank is the support behind a man, upon which he can call for help when he needs it. It is like the reserve troops which a general keeps to use when he gets in a pinch.

Your bank, to be really useful to you, should have a strict sense of honor. It should be absolutely safe. It should be big and strong enough to furnish help when it is called for.

Where can you find such a bank?
