WHAT FOR TOMORROW?

Perhaps to every age there has seemed to be the same absence of the fundamental virtues in the rising generation, those virtues that are developed through the hard school of experience with life that holds the necessity to work and to sacrifice. Industry, integrity, honor, consideration for the rights of others, these do not grow where there is every opportunity for self indulgence, where there is lacking the spur to work that ambition applies.

Conditions today are unfavorable for the development of the real virtues of character because of the false standards that have been set up as a result of the war and the bad habits that we developed during that period. Money easily and quickly acquired, the evidence of dishonor in high places, the sense of greater importance of self over one's fellows, extravagance in spending and in indulgence in pleasures not always wholesome, these are some factors that have brought about the weakening of character in this unsettled time. No longer does the fear of Hell compel obedience to the moral code. No longer is there a public opinion that refuses to countenance wrongdoing. No longer is there the recognition of responsibility for the spiritual welfare of children as the compelling element in the relation between parent and child. How we are to make good the loss is not yet apparent. Perhaps we are to find that the young people of today are working out their own salvation in very fact. We shall see as the years go on. Whether the boys and girls of today will see the weakness in the training within the home and make good the loss to their children, we also shall see. We can only hope, and hoping, perhaps, inspire respect in the youth of today for the virtues that seem to be departing from us.

For a generation the children of the public schools of the United States have been given instruction of fairly scientific accuracy, concerning the effect of alcohol upon human tissue. Today that teaching is being continued, but it should be supplemented by other if there is to be the greatest good accomplished towards the strengthening of public opinion in the matter of the value of the Eighteenth Amendment. Early training in the essential quality of observance of the law, respect for law and order, should be a part of the teaching of the public schools to the end that the children of today who are struggling with the rudiments of education shall grow into men and women who will look upon the observance of the law as a thing to be expected of decent citizens, and will consider violation of it as an evidence of bad citizenship worthy of immediate and severe punishment. Tolerance of wrong doing is quite a different thing from the charity that seeks the redemption of the evildoer. It is a distinction that should be impressed upon children from the very beginning of their mental and moral development.

VACATION

Soon the vacation period will begin, the weeks of the year in which there is the minimum of activity in useful pursuits, and the maximum of activity for fun. The people of the city go to the country, where, by the way, there is little of the vacation atmosphere about life for those who live there.

It is rather an interesting circumstance that the people who have worked hardest and are in greatest need of the vacation are, generally speaking, those who do not get it. It is the leisure class, the women and children whose duties are exceedingly light, who find it possible to spend the summer months in idleness. The men of the summer vacationists are compelled, and in most instances content, to have the two weeks play time.

Certainly it is good for children of the city to get into the open air and to enjoy the freedom of the country for a part of the year. But it is not necessary and should not be the practice that they spend the whole of the time doing nothing. There are so many things that are impossible during the crowded days of the school season. The summer offers the time for learning those things that every girl and every boy ought to learn. And incidentally there would be a greater enjoyment of the summer, a readier mind to take up the work of the school year in the autumn.

Summer rates are announced on railroads to the east, news suggesting a getting back to normalcy that appeals to the general public in an unmistakable way. Not since the year following the breaking out of war in Europe has there been such a thing as reduced rates to the Atlantic coast. Cost of living gradually goes down. Clothing and food may be bought at a lower rate than they could a year ago, but reduction has been so gradual that we scarcely have noted the change. It is in the return of pre-war conditions, such as rates on the railroads, that bring realization that there is a steady advance towards things as they were before the war.
