A PLACE ON THE SEAS

A place on the seas is the ambition of the United States, an even chance at the world's commerce and a fair share of the benefits that come from it. The United States has never before had much concern for shipping. It has been content to import from other countries, to use ships of other ownership, to submit to the general dictum that this country has no penchant for seafaring. The war with the demands it put upon us for transporting materials and men overseas has revealed to us our capacity to do business on the water, a capacity that we have no disposition to allow to become weakened by disuse, or to slip from us for lack of ambition to exercise it. We are willing to accept and observe the motto, "Live and let live." We have no design upon the commerce of any other country, except as may be gained in the legitimate way of honest competition.

America has a way of doing what it sets out to do, when there is determination and justice in its favor. We shall secure that place on the seas that rightly belongs to us, and we shall use the position that it gives us to the general benefit, if we are as scrupulous as we should be in recognition of the rights of others.

THE COUNTRY AND GREATNESS

Judge Gary says that the country is the land of opportunity for youth. He who would succeed in life should start amid green fields and running brooks.

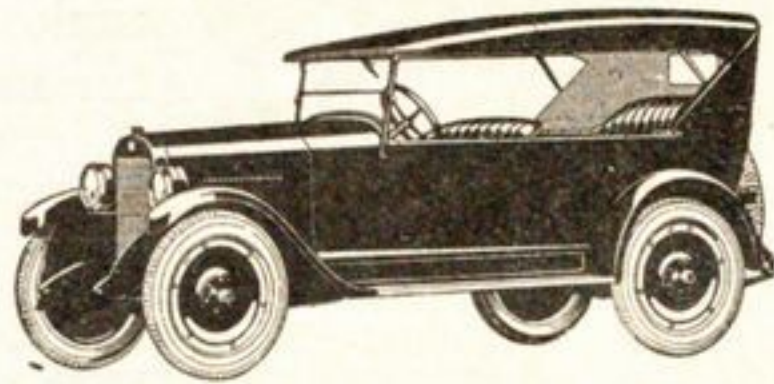

Certain it is that the great have come from the farm in large enough proportion to give the appearance of truth to the belief that there is virtue in an early life on the farm.

Reduced, however, it develops that it is the exceptional among farm lads who succeed in anything more than the average way. Success comes to the boy who has ambition and application, who learns how to work and endure hardship on the farm and has time in the isolation and the monotony of the environment of the rural life to think things out and to work out a plan to life that, adhered to, brings him through to the success for which he has been willing to sacrifice, towards which he has striven. Just being born in the country does not ensure greatness. There must be the elements of greatness, the fundamentals of character that are developed by the discipline of the life of the farm.

Reverence

If there is any one thing that should be typical of the mortician's attitude toward his work, it should be a deep and heartfelt reverence. Sometimes this is sadly lacking.

We have always held our work as an almost sacred task; we have found that our delicacy has been, and is, appreciated.

When you need the services of a mortician, you will find our Golden Rule service always available.
