PRINTING which is designed to make or help make sales does not necessarily have to be printed in several colors or in elaborate forms. If the picture is interesting and the text matter sincere and convincing—there is splendid opportunity for results, if the printed items are sent to people who may be interested in buying what is described.

Government postcards are not very elegant, as a form of advertising, yet a merchant tailor in a Middle West town built up a business for many miles around WHOLLY because he made a definite plan of mailing an interestingly illustrated and written postcard EVERY MONTH to a selected list of members. At first he did the work himself. But within a year business had come to such volume that he had to have an assistant solely to record orders and continue the advertising program.

There is no store which cannot use interesting printing for making more sales.
