

Art League Holds First Meeting of Season November 5

ALL the knowledge and experience of DeForest, without whose inventions there could be no radio, were called into play to make the F-5 Radiophone an instrument which would, in small space and at small cost, render, a calibre of performance only equalled by a rare few of the bulkier, costlier sets.

Besides its unsurpassed distance-getting, its selective power and its loud, clear volume, the F-5 has the same fidelity in reproducing every tone and inflection of broadcast programs that has given DeForest instruments their outstanding reputation for tone quality.

Precision and skill akin to the watch-making art in nicety of workmanship, choice of materials and economy of space, have produced a receiver of unexampled constancy and uniformity of operation. It tunes in the stations simply and positively. The setting of each of the three dials is practically identical. Once a station has been located and the settings noted, that station will always be gotten at the same dial readings regardless of the length of antenna or the location where the set is used.

The F-5 is non-oscillating, and so it tunes noiselessly without squawks, squeals or hissing sounds. It is also non-radiating, and will not disturb neighboring sets.

All essential parts are DeForest-designed and DeForest-made, especially for this set, and are electrically proportioned to work in unison—a very different matter from an assembly of ready-made parts of unbalanced capacities. All parts are fastened with tubular rivets, preventing movement or loosening of connections which might cause disturbing noises. Every joint is a mechanical joint, giving a permanently rigid mechanical structure.

The owner of a DeForest F-5 may be confident that his Radiophone will not suffer by comparison with any set, and that it anticipates the trend of radio development and will be adequate and satisfactory for years to come.
