

Sees Hope of Europe In Children of Near East

The growing children of that section of the world known as the Near East are destined to prove the most important of factors in determining the future peace of Europe. The recently negotiated pact of the powers at Locarno is a long step forward, and one that should give hope to the rest of civilization, but it is the up-coming generation in the disturbed Balkan states and the country East of Constantinople which will play the biggest part in making peace permanent.

These were the statements of F. J. Michel, executive secretary of the Illinois Committee on Near East Relief in connection with an announcement from headquarters here concerning plans for the observance of Golden Rule Sunday, which is set for December 6 this year. The day is to be observed in the cities and towns of the state, and the local committees are already busy working out the details.
