

THEY ARRIVE EARLY FOR THESE CONCERTS

Also, the Patrons of the Symphony Players of Chicago Remain to Praise

By MUSIC CRITIC

The second concert of the current series of Dasch concerts at New Trier hall went off with brilliancy on Tuesday evening, November 24. As usual the hall was filled at 7:45. Evidently the event is socially as well as musically attractive. Or it may very well be that our orchestral patrons realize that it's the late bird that gets the poor seat.

The Symphony Players opened their program with the overture to Carl Nicolai's comic opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The piece is remarkably entertaining, being, as one critic says, "one of the few German light comedy overtures which can hold their own with the lighter overtures of Auber, Herold and Rossini." A delightful melody recurs many times in this overture. Its value was enhanced by the easy and expressive manner with which the orchestra presented it.

Following this, came that one of Mozart's symphonies regarded by some well known connoisseurs as his "orchestral masterpiece." It was played with a sure feeling for its grace and beauty. As an encore the genial director gave the audience another of Mozart's incomparable minuets.

The third selection on the evening's program was a violin solo by Catherine Wade-Smith. Miss Smith has achieved considerable fame, being the first soloist to appear with the Civic Orchestra of Chicago, and also having been several times on the programs of the Chicago Symphony orchestra. She is certainly an admirable violinist. Her playing of the Lalo number was a joy to both eye and ear. Her powers of interpretation were equaled only by her surprising technical ability. She is a young woman of much style and unusual promise.

The second half of the concert consisted of compositions by Rubinstein, Liszt and Berlioz. Few of these red-letter occasions have been so uniformly enjoyable as this, the latest.

Miss Mabel Forberg of 960 Linden avenue left Wednesday to spend Thanksgiving with her sister, Miss Serena Forberg, who is attending the University of Wisconsin at Madison.
