N. U.-Armour Merger Great Chicago Asset

Chicago may become the greatest of engineering educational centers if the amalgamation of Armour Institute and Northwestern university School of Engineering is completed, according to President Walter Dill Scott of Northwestern, who contributes an editorial to the "Armour Engineer," in the current quarterly issue. The editorial deals with the various sides of the amalgamation and should please students and alumni of both institutions, as Dr. Scott is sure the union will help each of their alma maters. He writes in part:

"The affiliation would mean for the Armour students a campus home, increased facilities for work, intimate contact with students of diverse interests, and in many ways a richer and a fuller undergraduate life.

"The affiliation would mean for the Armour alumni increased pride in their Alma Mater because of the increased possibility for her usefulness in the future.

"The affiliation would mean for the Armour faculty stability and expansion of the work which they have carried on so faithfully, and which will continue to develop under their co-operation.

"The affiliation would mean for the late P. D. Armour, his descendants, and for all who bear the name of Armour, a memorial that is appropriate, enduring and serviceable.

"The affiliation would mean for Northwestern university co-operation in developing an outstanding school in one of the most important phases of human learning.

"The affiliation would mean for the City of Chicago pre-eminence in the realm of engineering education. Chicago is increasingly a center of the engineering activities of America, and the combined efforts of Armour and of Northwestern should result in the creation of an institution that would command the esteem and support of the engineering interests of this great territory.

"The affiliation would mean so much for all concerned that the project must not fail."
