

What is the future of America?

Is industrial America about to crumple, or is it headed forward to unprecedented prosperity? Are we going at too fast a pace? Does the United States need a new national business policy? Will the present period of high wages end shortly? Are the mergers now taking place in the major industries necessary?

These are but a few of the questions statesmen, businessmen and industrial leaders are concerning themselves with today—questions that unthread the economic fabric of future existence—questions that personally affect every man, woman and child directly or indirectly. To know the answers to these and other economic questions is to open up a new vista of understanding of the future holds for America—Read

HENRY FORD

Giving for the First Time the Real Economic Philosophy of This Great Man

For the first time you have the opportunity of glimpsing into the workings of a mind possessed by the most successful captain of industry the world has ever known. Let Henry Ford tell you the magic formula by which he carries his gigantic burden—a business employing 200,000 workers, not one of whom receives less than $6.00 per day, which, including allied plants, provides a living for more than 3,000,000 people. His achievements are so unparalleled that this, his first authoritative utterance in years, compels attention.

He declares that: "Dishonest men do sometimes succeed; but only when they give service that exceeds their dishonesty. Honest men sometimes fail because they lack other essential qualities."—"High wages cannot be paid to any one just for the asking."—"If all profits were given to workers, improvements would not be possible." Read Ford's thoughts on the new order of things; his views on efficiency; his ideas on finance, and you obtain a complete study of economics in a new understandable form.
