Indian "Wa-hoo" to be Heard at Chicago's Rodeo

The "wa-hoo" of the Indian will mingle with the "yip-yip" of the cowboys and cowgirls when the second annual Chicago Rodeo gets under way in Soldiers' Field, Grant Park, August 14, giving an additional touch of color to this cross-section of the real West which the Domestic and Foreign Commerce committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce has arranged.

A band of more than fifty Flatheads from the government reservation at Arlee, Mont., will be brought here for the rodeo, according to word just received from Tex Austin, director of the tournament. They have been selected for their skill and daring as horsemen, and while barred from competition in the cowboy contests because their expenses are being paid by the management, they will have an opportunity to "do their stuff" in special events.

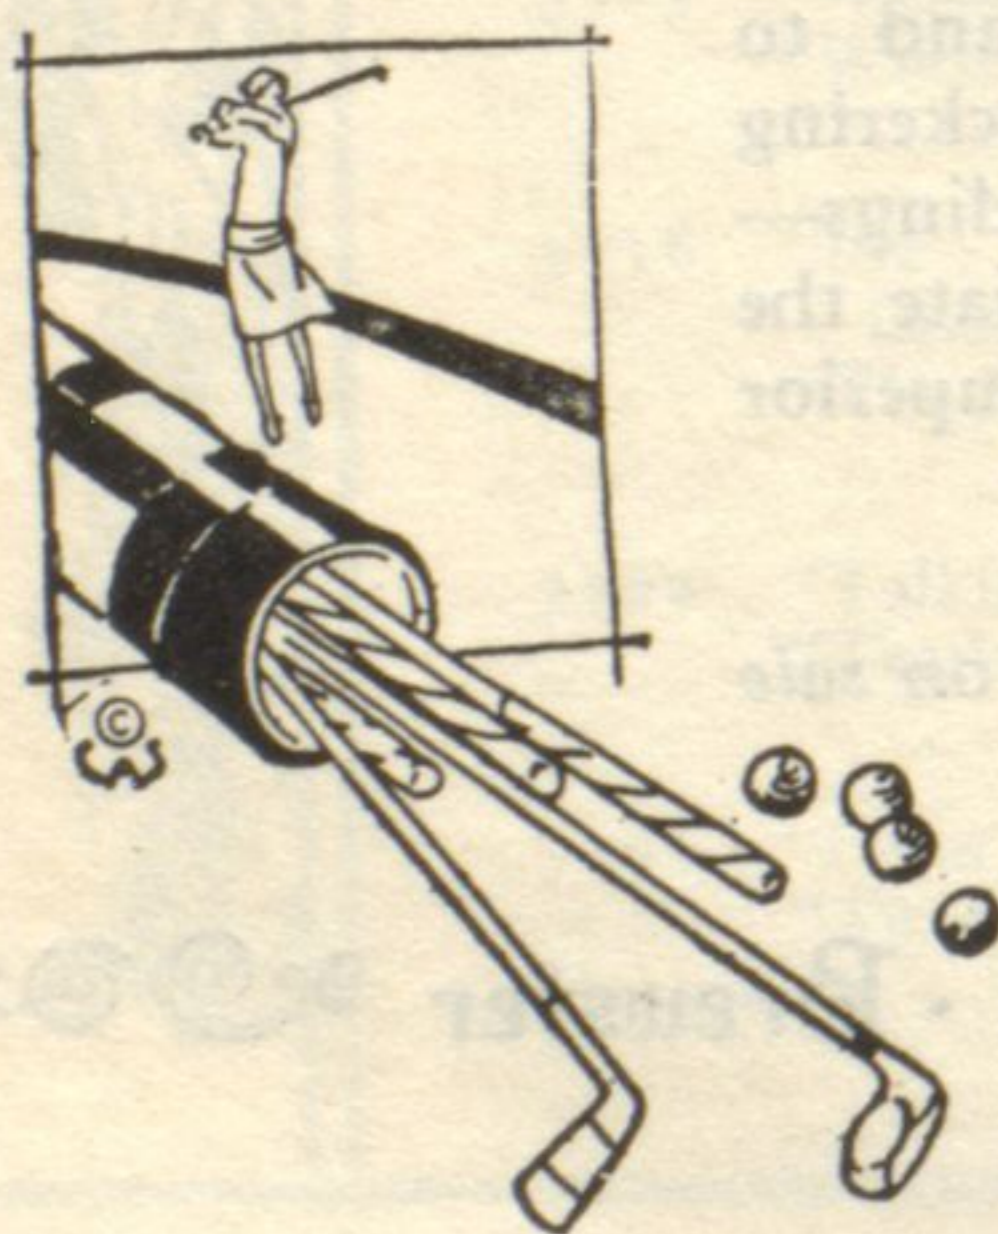

The band will bring with them two carloads of the fleetest Indian ponies, selected from the herds owned by the 3,000 members of the tribe who live on the reservation at Arlee. The Flatheads are now considered the best horsemen among all the Indian tribes now existent.

With the Indians will come their squaws and papooses and the entire outfit will camp at Soldiers' Field for about two weeks, as they will arrive here several days before the cowboy contests are started. They are bringing a carload of tepees and other camping equipment with which to make themselves comfortable during their stay in Chicago.
