CHARM IN A NOVEL

"AFTER NOON"

By Susan Ertz.
 D. Appleton & Co.

In the first three quarters of "After Noon" Susan Ertz has written one of the charming, rather idyllic stories which she knows well how to write. For the touch of pathos which is as necessary to the flavor of this type of story as salt is necessary to soup, there is the recognition by the father that his daughters are growing up and will one day leave him alone.

When Charles Lester's bombastic wife leaves him and her twin baby girls to run off with a journalist Charles Lester's life just begins. Not that he hadn't loved or thought he loved his wife, but he had been no more vital to the partnership than the fob on a watch. She had done all the time-keeping.

From that point on we see in spatches the slow analytical development of the man with his daughters, his work, and his constantly-being-compiled anthology of the best English prose.

But there is ever in the back ground of his mind the day where Venetia and Caroline to whose up bringing he has brought the finest things in his nature will bestow those gifts on other men. The day comes.

To be most artistic we should not have gone with Charles into his second matrimonial venture, which however might have lurked in the offing, but have left him, wistful, wondering even a little too sad; or perhaps at the magnificent moment when at the end of his first lonely evening which has been made enduring only by whiskey and soda, he turns to the taxi driver, at parting, and says, "It would give me great pleasure if you would call me Charles."
