McCormick Highway Opened Informally; Dedication Put Off

Without the blare of trumpets or ceremony of any sort McCormick boulevard, the Sanitary district's million-dollar, forty-foot highway, was informally opened to traffic Saturday morning. A workman kicked down the barriers, which all this year have blocked the boulevard each side of the subway at Oakton street. That signaled the fact that the subway was at last completed and the continuous six-mile stretch of boulevard was ready for use.

Traffic was comparatively light on the boulevard even on Sunday because the fact it was opened had not become generally known.

Postpone Celebration

A public celebration involving sanitary district officials and Chicago, Evanston and north shore city officials had been planned for Saturday. This, however, has been postponed to a later date because it was thought desirable to keep the road free from a parade or any other obstruction on the day of the Northwestern-Notre Dame football game.

Sanitary district officials said early this week that the date for the formal opening had not yet been set, and that as yet the program for the dedication ceremonies had not been entirely worked out. October 30, is favored as the date for this affair.

The boulevard extends along the sanitary canal from Devon avenue to West Railroad avenue immediately north of Grant street. It is built of reinforced concrete, with a ten foot strip on each side of concrete surfacing designed for trucks and other slow moving vehicles, and a middle 20-foot strip of asphalt surfacing for faster traffic.

Subway Finished Last

Except for the subway under the Northwestern tracks on the Mayfair division just south of Oakton street, the boulevard has been completed for a year.

A lighting system for the boulevard is yet to be installed. Plans for continuing the forty-foot highway on from the north end of the boulevard within the city of Evanston are as yet undecided.
