Says Education Should Attain Liberal Attitude

"If the university is to aid citizenship, we must first be clear as to what citizenship means," Prof. Ernest H. Hahne of Northwestern declared at one of the sessions of the Government Institute held at the university last week. "The aim and purpose of the university will vary with the ideas of citizenship. There appear to be four ideas of citizenship that have dominated political theory. First, the predominant idea was that the citizen was to protect the state and keep it in the good graces of the Gods. The function of the Sophists, therefore, was to inculcate religious training and worship in their students. Second, in the Middle Ages and the Reformation appears the idea that citizenship was for the sake of the group and that all interests should be subverted to group interest so that the function of the university was then to be to protect the group interests. Third, for the past fifty years the idea of citizenship appears to have been that the State should protect the individual so as to provide the maximum amount of self-assertion of freedom and liberty.

"The function of the university then would appear to be the ascertainment of highest individual aptitudes. Fourth, the recent idea appears to be that citizenship should then mean the attainment for the highest good of the individual consistent with highest good of the group or a swing of the pendulum from the third stage back to a compromise with the second stage. The function of the university would then appear to be to inculcate in the individual the highest degree of self-assertion that is consistent with the maximum degree of good for society."

"Liberal education means fundamentally the attainment of a liberal attitude not in the sense of license but in the sense of liberal mindedness for the best interests of common welfare."
