

Red Cross Issues 4265
First Aid Certificates

The Chicago chapter of the Red Cross reports that it has issued 4,265 first aid certificates to employes of the Chicago and suburban industrial firms during the twelve months ending May 31. Of this number, 222 lay instructors were appointed to teach the courses free of cost to their fellow employes.

A toll of 75,000 lives is claimed each year by industrial accidents in the United States. To reduce mortality from this source, the Red Cross offers its course of training in first aid to the injured.

The General Electric company, like the companies of the Bell Telephone company with which it is associated, requires all employes to take the Red Cross first aid course. To set an example for their workers, all the high executives receive instructions in the emergency care of the injured along with the shopmen. As a result, this company reports, there is a striking decrease of accidents and loss of time from work.
