Karl Way Is Given Opportunity to Act in 'The Other Wife'

Because it gives Karl Way a chance to do some real acting in addition to his customary excellent directing, "The Other Wife," the current bill at the New Evanston, should be appreciated by North Shore drama fans.

The plot is almost wholly fortuitous and the only character of outstanding importance is the attorney, Robert Bevington, who is depicted by Way. Bevington got mixed up in his youth with an adventuress and married her. She deserted him and he left the scenes he had known to start a new life, thinking that she was dead.

He married and lived happily ever after—until, on his eighteenth wedding anniversary, she turns up to demand her part of the riches he has acquired. She is killed—Bevington believes by the shot he fires—and her son—by him, Bevington believes—appears as the sweetheart of the attorney's daughter.

A poor wretch of the underworld is suspected of the murder and the police weave a web around him that is almost sure to send him to the chair. Bevington, almost a wreck from the mental strain he has been under, determines to fight for the wretch's life. The matter is satisfactorily cleared up before the final curtain as it could not have been cleared up in real life—life just "ain't that way."

Margaret Fuller, cast in a part much too old for her, does some very good acting, despite the handicap, as the attorney's wife. Rita Zane, the daughter, is much better than she has ever been. Robert Lowes, who has replaced Charles George as the company's leading man (for which thanks are hereby offered), does a fine job in the part of Richard Bender, the son of the murdered adventuress.

George Pembroke, the stage manager, who always does good work in any part he takes, does justice to the part of the suspect. The minor characters are played by Robert Ward, who is worthy of leading parts and should have them; Ann Dere, one of the most talented members of the company Bert Stork, a newcomer who is a worthy addition to the players; Lew Welsh, the inimitable character man; Beatrice Leiblee, whose work is erratic but sometimes rather good, as in the present play; Robert White, who plays well the parts he is suited to at all, and Marie Fischer, another newcomer.

A Story of a Rum-Running Sanitarium and an Heiress

All Kvale and his Jazz Collegians are planning a gay jazz jamboree of racing syncopation, for the week beginning March 25 at the Norshore theater, in a scintillating production, entitled "Bubbling Over."

This lively show is a series of fast stepping intermingled with the latest melodies, crooned by clowing Al and his joy-boys and speedy dance numbers by maiden jockeys will be another attractive feature.

Bebe Daniels comes to the screen in her latest Paramount comedy, "Feel My Pulse," a story of a rum-running sanitarium and inebriated patients. It is a gay bit of humor, with Bebe her audacious self. In the role of the heiress of the institution, she innocently comes to much grief and trouble, but forgets her imaginary ills in all the ensuing excitement.

Richard Arlen, as a reporter, plays opposite Miss Daniels, while William Powell enacts the role of the humorous villain. Their work is clever, and Powell departs from his usual serious characterizations to such an extent as to totally convince his audiences as to his comedy talent. Machine, guns revenuers, battles and the antics of would-be invalids all figure in this gay farce.
