

Jack and Jill Theater Plans New Building

The Jack and Jill theater, located at 943 Rush street, Chicago, was formed about fifteen months ago in an attempt to find a real and workable answer to the question of "Where is there available an inexpensive theatrical entertainment—especially for the children?"

As youth was found to begin at three years and never in joy to grow old, two acting companies were formed; one of children to give entertainment to children under sixteen years and the other to give more mature performances.

During the fifteen months experimental work the theater has given outlet and expression for dramatic and emotional talent and instincts of the many young people engaged directly in acting and indirectly as audiences. It has also been possible to revive many fine old plays and serve as a proving ground for many Chicago playwrights. Even in cramped quarters it has become a social center for over two hundred people.

Because it was felt that movies, except on rare occasions, are too stimulating emotionally for children, the children's company was formed as an experiment. As an outgrowth of this experiment arises the plan to build for the children a theater of their own—in their own terms and interpreted by actors of their own age.

Plans for this theater are now nearly completed by the Edwin D. Krenn architectural office and the structure will be started as soon as a plan for financing it can be arranged.

J. Fred McGuire and his daughter, Florence Louise, of 565 Sheridan road, came home Wednesday from a Mediterranean cruise of about three months. Mrs. McGuire, who was in Florida while the rest of the family took the cruise, returned last week.
