

INTERPRETS RELIGION

Dr. A. G. Widgery of Cambridge University Gives Next Talk in Series

The next of the talks giving a modern interpretation of religion in the series arranged by Northwestern university will be given by Dr. Alban G. Widgery, Stanton lecturer on the philosophy of religion, Cambridge university. He will speak Thursday, Nov. 22, at 7:30 in Wieboldt hall on the McKinlock campus.

Dr. Widgery's subject will be "Towards a Constructive Philosophy of Religion."

Last Thursday's forum was addressed by Dr. Edward S. Ames, professor of theology at the University of Chicago, who asserted religion today must be interpreted by ritual and art, for the colorless and abstract religion is unattractive.

"This colorful ritualizing of religion," said Dr. Ames, "is more difficult than many realize, but the principle upon which it can be done is clear. The modern religious leader must see the moral and spiritual values in daily life and must discern the social relations of normal human beings. Then he must enhance and beautify these relationships with the weight and resources of public recognition and of celebration."

"The majority of persons today must take their religion second-handed," said Dr. Ames, just as they are compelled by the exigencies of modern life to depend upon others for their ideas of politics, science and art. Therefore, the preacher and religious teacher today must plan carefully the type of religion to be given the people.

The lectures are open to the public, but limited capacity of the conference room makes it necessary to make reservations in advance.
