Traces Mankind

Isaac J. Cox, professor of history, Northwestern university, in a lecture Wednesday, Dec. 5, before the contemporary thought class at the university will relate the story of man from the dawn of recorded history to the present time, showing the political development and tracing the transmission of cultural elements.

He will pick up the thread of the story told by Fay-Cooper Cole, anthropologist, who spoke to the class recently on pre-historic man, starting with an account of ancient civilizations in the Tigris-Euphrates and Nile valleys. The Grecian city-states, the Roman empire, invasions of the northerners, formation of the European nationalities and the modern period of expansion are phases he will describe.
