THE PASSING WORLD
"My Studio Window"
By Marietta Minnegerode Andrews
E. P. Dutton

Marietta Minnegerode Andrews who wrote so frankly and with a rather humble and wistful charm her "Memoirs of a Poor Relation" has continued her memories in "My Studio Window." From that window in Washington she has watched the great of the world go by, catching, very appropriately, their silhouettes with her unusual expertness with black paper and scissors. Mrs. Andrews pretends to no great intimacy with most of the people of whom she writes, though many of them have sat for her; she tells about them, chattily, rather, as if we sat with her and watched them passing by. Her subjects range from hats and bald heads to the reaction from slavery, and she has followed after them genially not trying to impose on them stringent form. Her silhouettes which illustrate the book add greatly to its interest.

A JEALOUS MOTHER.

"The Feathered Nest"

By Margaret Leech
Horace Liveright

"The Feathered Nest" does indeed, as its publisher's blurb suggests, "confirm Miss Margaret Leech's high rank among our younger writers." Those who read "Tin Wedding" probably remember it as a book of more than usual talent; readers of this book will find it an extraordinarily competent handling of a difficult situation, a nice problem of a jealous mother and her three sons and the various women with whom they fall in love. Isabelle Forster took to money, when she married her rich husband, as a duck takes to water. Efficiently and soullessly she ordered her life, finding room in it for plenty of material things and a passionate adoration for her three sons, very little left over for the husband, who, as a tactful individual should, gets himself killed by a fall from his horse. That clears the way for Isabelle nicely, and she goes in her appointed triumphal course. Until her sons grow up and then came the inevitable conflicts with the "other women." Miss Leech carries her story through admirably without a slip, making of each of the sons an individual, not wholly losing your sympathy even for a selfish and domineering woman.

GUIDE-LECTURE TOURS

Next week's guide-lecture tours at Field Museum of Natural History will begin with "Palms" and "Egypt" at 11 a. m. and 3 p. m. respectively on Monday (December 17). Other days at the same hours subjects will be: Tuesday, "The Life of Birds" and "Textiles"; Wednesday, "Canoes and Other Boats" and "Crystals and Minerals"; Thursday, two general tours of selected anthropological, botanical, geological and zoological exhibits; and Friday, "Children Around the World" and "The Fir and Other Trees."
