

Vast Building Program Started at Chicago U.

Immediate construction of new residence halls to cost three million dollars and the probable authorization of halls to cost another two million will make the University of Chicago much more attractive to students from the Chicago district. The halls will provide the stimulating association of college life for the students, combining the advantages of a university community with those of a large city.

Generous cooperation of Julius Rosenwald, one of the leading benefactors of the university, has made possible the dormitory program. Mr. Rosenwald, a member of the university's board of trustees, has offered to pay forty per cent of a total construction cost of five million dollars. He will give $1,200,000 of the three million dollar program, and an additional $800,000 if the board authorizes a total of five million's of construction. The university's part of the cost will come out of available funds.

It is planned to construct most if not all of the residence halls on ground owned by the university south of the Midway. The units already authorized will accommodate 400 men and 380 women. Present dormitories house 320 men and 290 women, so that approximately 1,400 students will be provided for by the buildings already authorized, and the additional construction would bring the total to 2,000.

The halls will be of the entry type, each entry serving a group of about thirty-five students. One of the important features of the plan will be ample provision for recreation grounds for intramural sports immediately adjacent to the new dormitories.
