IMPORTANCE OF ROUTINE.

For the housekeeper routine is a necessity without it disorder, misrule, chaos reign. Peace, rest, quiet com- fort, security, and no place in a dis- orderly household. The two golden rules for the housekeeper are "A place for everything and everything in its place." A time for everything and everything in its time. Let the routine be set in these two grooves and it will run as smoothly as cars on the track, and allow the speed to be in- creased almost indefinitely. In the well-regulated household there is a time for sleeping, and when the hour strikes everybody is in bed and asleep. There is a time for eating, and when the hour strikes everybody is at table. There are days for certain tasks, and the tasks are done on the days set for them. Each day, too, is marked off into portions, and each portion has its all work.

The difficulty with most people is not in marking out a routine, but in adhering to it when it is once marked out, no matter whether one "feels like it" or not. It isn't easy, by any means, to break one's self into a relentless routine, and plod on and on like a plough-horse, but the work of the world is done by routinists. Poets, painters, musicians, novelists—those who we think must "feel like" doing their "creative" work—are as diligent in routine as the dullest book-keeper, or most plodding kitchen-maid. Kings and queens, and rulers are even more subject to routine than those whose heads bear no weight of crowns.
