CHAPTER XIX.—(Cont'd.)
To Dave's surprise his visitor broke out in a ribald laugh. She had seated herself on a desk, and was swinging one foot jauntily. "It's all off," she said. "Say, Dave, you couldn't lose me in this tuff. You don't remember me, do you? Well, all the better. I'm rather glad I broke down on this job. I used to be something of an actress, and I'd have put it over if it hadn't been for the kid. The fact is, Dave," she continued, "I was sent up here to decoy you. It wasn't fair fighting, and I didn't like it, but money has been mighty slow of late. I wonder how much you'd give to know who sent me?"

Dave pulled some bills from his pocket and held them before her. She took them from his hand.

"Conward," she said.

Dave's blood went to his head. "The scoundrel!" he cried. "The low down dog! There's more in this than appears on the surface."

"Sure there is," she said. "There's another woman. There always is."

Elden walked to his desk. From a drawer he took a revolver, toyed with it a moment in his hands; broke it open, crushed its full of cartridges and thrust it in his pocket.

The girl watched him with friendly interest. "Believe me, Dave," she said, "if Conward turns up missing I won't know a thing—not a d—d thing."

For a moment he stood irresolute. He could only guess what Conward's plan had been; but that it had been babilical and cowardly, and that it concerned Irene, he had no doubt. His impulse was to immediately confront Conward, force a confession, and deal with him as the occasion might seem to require. But his eye fell on the miss, with his shock of brown hair and "They have combed face sponders of hair you first," he said, were making in Toronto visit the royal Ontario Museum.
