

Dawlish Warren

There is a 'split of land' that runs across the estuary of the Exe, and as the centuries pass, the sea plays pranks with it. Centuries ago the tideway opened to the west, not far from the red cliffs that tower there, and then Exmouth and the Warren were one; but now it is at Exmouth that the long sands are separated from the shore and, past that little port, the ships go up the river, while the eastern end of the Warren joins the mainland. So it has stood within man's memory; but now, as though tired of this arrangement, wind and sea are modifying the place again, for the one has found a new path in the midst, and the other has blown at the sand dunes until their heads are reduced by many feet from their old altitude.

These sands are many colored, for over the yellow staple prevails a delicate and changing harmony of various tones, now rose, now blue, as though a million minute shining particles were reflecting the light of the sky and bringing it to earth on their tiny surfaces.

As a lad, I very well remember the silvery hills towering to little mountains above my head; and again I can hear the gentle tinkle of the sand for ever rustling about me where I basked like a lizard in some sun-baked nook. It was a dreamland of wonders for me, and now I was seeking mermaids' purses in the tide-fringe and sorrowing to find them empty; now I was after treasure-trove flung overboard from pirate ships, now hunting for the secret hiding-places of buccaniers in the dunes.

The ships go by still; but not the ships I knew; the flowers still sparkle in the hollows and brakes; but their wonder has waned a little. No more shall I weave the sea-rocket and grey-green wheat grass into crowns for the sea-nymphs to find when they come up from the waves in the moonlight.

It is a place of sweet air and wonderful sunshine. On a sunny day, with the sand ablaze against the blue sky, one might think oneself in some desert region of the East; but then green spaces, scarlet flags and a warning "fore!" tell a different story. For golfers have found the Warren now. Where once I roamed with only the gully above and rabbits below for company, and for music the sigh of the wind in the bents and the song of the sea, half a hundred little houses have sprung up, and bungalows, red and white and green, throng the Warren. At hand is a railway station, whence hundreds descend to take their pleasure, while easterly this once peaceful region is most populous and the Exmouth boats cross the estuary and land their passengers.

One does not grudge the joy of the place to townsfolk or golfers; one only remembers the old haunts of peace, now peaceful no more, the old beauties that have vanished under the little dwellings and little flagstaffs, the former fine distinction that has departed.

Dawlish Warren now gives pleasure to hundreds, where once only the dreamer or sportsman wandered through its mazes; and that is well; but we of the old brigade, who remember its far-flung loneliness, its rare wild flowers, its unique contours, its isolation and peculiar charm, may be forgiven if we forget the twentieth century for a season and conjure back the old time before us.—Eden Philpotts, in "A West Country Sketch Book."

The International Bank

Cleveland Plain Dealer: If the bank is to become as those who conceived it expect, much more than a reparations collecting and disbursing institution; if it evolves into a great central bank of the world, a bank for central banks, much is to be said in favor of locating it in an important financial centre rather than in a small neutral capital, as is now the plan. There is more than a selfish interest in the British endeavor to locate the bank in London. From every point of view except reparations administration, which in a few years will probably become a detail of its business, a London location for the bank is not illogical.

The Restless Boy

Probably what is needed to keep a restless boy satisfied is to study his wishes and inclinations sympathetically. It may be that he needs something on which to centre his affections—a dog that he can call entirely his own may be just the thing—or a few pigeons or other pets. A different type of boy may need a stamp collection or a set of tools, or some books of adventure; but whatever it is, there is always an avenue of approach which will lead to contentment and happiness.—J. J. Kelso.

Persevere in Duty

There is nothing more valuable as a moral gymnastic, nothing more strength-giving to the soul, than to persevere in duty even when we are not in the mood for it and the doing of it is unattended with any feeling of agreeableness.—Professor S. L. Wilson.

Pleasures

It is only a poor sort of happiness that could ever come by caring very much about our own narrow pleasures.—George Elliot.

The Man to Blame

Calgary Herald (Ind. Cons.): In view of Mr. Gardiner's determination to cling to office until kicked out, His Honor's course cannot be exposed to fair criticism. The Liberals are the largest single party in the new House. While it is true the three opposition groups have entered into an agreement to support the present Government and assist a Conservative Administration, the Lieutenant-Governor is maintaining a proper attitude in awaiting developments following the opening of the new Legislature. He can hardly be expected to take such a radical step as to call for his adviser's resignation in face of the latter's assumption that he may be able to command a majority after the session opens. The proper target for criticism is Premier Gardiner.

The Wheat Pool

London Free Press (Cons.): Whether the pool can stand the strain of a hard year remains to be seen. There have been big crops ever since it was founded in 1925. It was organized at a time when there was a rising world market. It is now facing a crisis; if it can weather the coming year, then the pool can be set down as a permanent part of Canadian economic life.

"I gave them to my eldest girl when she was anaemic, pale and thin and had no appetite. They restored her to health and later when my youngest daughter was run-down after diphtheria, I again brought them into use. My daughter was thin, pale and extremely nervous but the pills soon set her right."

Bow Versus Golf Club

William Thomson, well-known western golf professional, and Chief Sitting Eagle, of the Stonies, differed as to which could beat the other at golf, each armed with his chosen weapon. Sitting Eagle took his trusty bow and arrow; Thomson relied on his golf clubs. At the end of a nine-hole try-out the Chief was four up on the pro. His target was of course larger than Thomson's objective and he could and did "hole out" from long range. The contest was staged over one-half of the championship course where the competition for the Prince of Wales Trophy will be staged in the "Canadian Golfer" tour of Canada, starting from Toronto August 12.

Communism in Australia

Perth Sunday Times: It will be noticed that the "Red Ragers" concentrate chiefly on key industries, such as coal, and on transport unions. The object is quite apparent—the dislocation of the means of trade, whether overseas or Australian, reacts on many other industries, and the objective of a general strike is reached without actually declaring it. So also if coal supplies are stopped innumerable industries in which steam or electrical power is essential, are automatically thrown into idleness, and the aim of a general upheaval is attained. All this is a carefully thought out scheme for provoking what is called a world revolution, and is the definitely prepared plan of the Red Internationale of Moscow.

Tide of Friendship

The tide of friendship does not rise high on the banks of perfection. Amiable weaknesses and shortcomings are the food of love. It is from the roughness and imperfect breaks in a man that you are able to lay hold of him. My friend is not perfect—no more am I—and so we suit each other admirably.—Alexander Smith.

MAGNANIMITY

The essence of friendship is entrepreneurship, a total magnanimity and trust.—R. W. Emerson.

Poisonous Wild Fruits

Contrary to an impression that is rather generally held, the number of the berries and other fleshy fruits growing in our woods and fields that are poisonous is not large. The hesitancy that is ordinarily felt about partaking of any but the most familiar of them is judicious, but its real warrant is not that so many dangers lurk in that quarter, but that we do not know how to recognize them. It we could only learn to distinguish between the safe and the unsafe we might dispel a lot of needless uneasiness.

A glance at the list of poisonous plants under investigation through the surveys of the Division of Botany, Dominion Experimental Farm, Ottawa, shows that scarcely half a dozen wild fruits of eastern Canada need to be considered dangerous. To become familiar with that number is no impossible task. In view of the fact that young children are not so discriminating about what they eat as are their elders, it is indeed a duty owed to them, first to teach and warn them, and second to remove the danger as far as possible.

The woodland plants with fleshy fruits, that should be regarded as poisonous or highly suspicious, are the baneberries differing little, except in the red and white round shiny fruit; blue cohosh, bluish both as to foliage and fruit; moonseed, also with blue fruit, and unlike the others a climbing plant; and may apple or mandrake with larger, oval fruit, nearly an inch long, borne singly in the crotch of the two umbrella-like leaves. May apple is found chiefly in Ontario, moonseed from western Quebec to Manitoba and the others fairly generally in eastern Canada.

Along fence-rows anywhere in Ontario and eastward, may be seen another climbing shrub, nightshade or bittersweet, bearing clusters of shining green, yellow to ripe scarlet berries. Another species, the black nightshade, is a smaller bushy plant appearing in gardens. The black fruit is sometimes eaten with impunity, and the plant has been "improved" into the wonderberry of gardens, but at other times has distinctly poisonous properties.

Poison ivy has also white fleshy fruits, which are not, however, apt to be eaten. Other fruits, including even the strawberry, cannot be eaten without discomfort by certain persons. Most other poisonous plants have dry fruits that do not tempt the novice. Any High School botany contains descriptions by which the above named plants may be recognized.—H. Groh, Division of Botany, Central Experimental Farm, Ottawa, Ont.

Clear Track Ahead!

Chicago Post: Unquestionably the Kellogg Treaty has cleared the air, and made possible a new and better approach to the problem. Furthermore, the undoubted sincerity of Ramsay MacDonald and his Government has disarmed the cynical and suspicious. Instead of a struggle of technicians to outwit one another as each group fights jealously for its own pre-conceived plan, we will have a meeting of statesmen who are prepared to agree on a policy of world imbroglio technicalities to the task portance.

The Baumes Law

New York World: Now a good argument can be made out for the principle of this law. There are criminals whom it would be impossible to reclaim by any means now within the capacities of public officials. Whether they are absolutely irreclaimable, or merely irreclaimable with our present resources, need not be argued here. For immediate practical purposes they are irreclaimable. That being the case, they ought to be segregated for the rest of their lives. But if that is the case, then surely they ought to be segregated no less carefully from those convicts who will return to civil life at the end of their terms.

Self-deception

No parents can see the deformity of their children, and still stronger is this self-deception with respect to the offspring of the mind.

When Food Sours

About two hours after eating many people suffer from sour stomachs. They call it indigestion. It means that the stomach nerves have been over-stimulated. There is excess acid. The way to correct it is with an alkali, which neutralizes many times its volume in acid. The right way is Phillips' Milk of Magnesia—just a tasteless dose in water. It is pleasant, efficient and harmless. It has remained the stand-

Into the Sahara

The train from Sfax to Gabes was even less in a hurry than the other one, but we had provided ourselves with chocolate and biscuits, having been warned, and we were perfectly happy. Every now and then, loitering through the golden light of late afternoon, we caught sight of little pictures that seemed to have been staged for us. There was a Bedouin girl in gorgeous blue rags—the unbecoming blue of Renaissance painters—watching us with a modest arm flung over her face to hide it. It was a face worth hiding, too, and worth showing, for that matter, even though the round cheeks were deeply tattooed in dark blue.

From time to time we caught sight of a shapeless creature in a burnous the color of the sand, mounted on the back of a pathetic little black ass that seemed to be bending beneath his weight. An dthen four solemn camels lolloping one behind the other, bearing fantastic loads of hundreds of white clay gargoulettes—those glorious jars, the shape of Greek amphorae that keep water cool as though drawn from an Artesian well, even in the full heat of summer. And as the character of the country changed, there were no more olive trees, nothing but scattered palms and dusty caespit plants—it seemed to me the people changed too. There were no more white robes, only earth-colored burnouses. Skins were brown, instead of pale olive, and here and there we saw thick lips and a coal-black gloss on the skin that came from Negro blood.

There was plenty of time to observe all this as we went along, for the train had now contracted a habit of stopping at least twenty minutes at each station—frequently while the driver got down and parleyed with friends or had a drink and about a quarter of an hour between each station, for no known reason. On one occasion I saw a family party descend with all their household goods on their backs and a brown baby swung in a red handkerchief dangling dangerously from his mother's arms. They moved off slowly into the "bled," and faded into the sandy distance, no hut or tent being visible.—Dorothy Buck (Madame Leon Chavanne), in "The New Lotus-Eaters."

LOSSES

A man dies as often as he loses his friends.—Bacon.

How well you look!
"I am writing you again to express my sincere gratitude for the continued success I have maintained through my daily dose of Kruschen. Only last week a man met me (who saw me a few months ago when I was crippled with rheumatism). His first remark was 'how well I looked.' I replied, 'Yes, I take only Kruschen Salts to thank.' He said he was 'feeling' off colour and would start the Kruschen habit next day. I always recommend 'Kruschen Salts.'—JAS. F. WOOLSTON, Original letter on file for inspection. Kruschen Salts is obtainable at drug and department stores in Canada at 75c. a bottle. A bottle contains enough to last for 4 or 5 months—good health for half-cent a day."
