GILLETT'S LYE EATS DIRT

"Crop" to Revive Tract in South
Spartanburg, S.C.—South Carolina's gigantic soil reclamation project, to rekindle the spark of productive capacity in more than 100,000 acres of badly eroded lands in three counties, is rapidly nearing the stage when the gaping red clay hillsides, now denuded of fertile topsoil and cut to their underlying rock "bone" by deep gullies and huge slices taken piece-meal from the rich earth by ever-recurring rains, will be replaced in the Tiger River basin by fields of green crops especially adapted to thwarting the ravages of nature.

Jill of the Fields

A ROMANCE
By Kennaway James

SYNOPSIS
Motherless Jill Merridew becomes on the death of her father, owner of a farm, the countess of Mark Hanson, head man to assist her in the management. Mark resents remarks made by Phillip Barbour, who professes to be investigating the history of old country families. On returning to London he meets two designers. The reason for Phillip's interest proves to be a chemical fertilizer discovered by Jill's father, which he had not made known to Jill.

"Look here, Jill," Mark said, "I haven't come to talk about the letter I sent you. We'll forget about it for the moment. It is something else."

"What is it, Mark?" asked Jill, knowing full well the reason for Mark's call. The look in his eyes was enough to show that he was in no sentimental mood.

"It's about this damned newspaper," he said, "I suppose it's true enough, because you as good as told me you were going to marry him. In fact, you couldn't do much else when half the farm has been seen by being kissed by him. But why have you been fool enough to get engaged and announce it on the very day of the murder?"

"I—I didn't," began Jill, but Mark cut her short.

"Well, you got engaged, anyhow, and the whole affair looks as ridiculous as it is callous. You'll never live it down, Jill, never."

"I don't care," said Jill with an attempt at defiance which did not deceive Mark. He knew she was going to cry, but he went on regardless.

"Tell me, if you didn't put it in that newspaper, who did?"

"I—I don't know, Mark," whispered Jill as a tear stole down her cheek. Really I don't. I was as surprised as you."

"Well, if you didn't put it in I'm pretty certain who did," said Mark, "and that's your precious Mr. Barbour. What nice, gentlemanly taste he has, if he did it!"

"Mark, I don't know, I haven't seen him to-day, yet. Oh, Mark, why are you so unkind to me?" She was crying now. "Why can't I be left alone in all these troubles? And you, above all people!"

"Yes, me above all people," answered Mark. "It's because I am the one who's talking to you like this. You know I love you, and I on my side know that, you've turned me down. But it makes no difference. I shall always regard you as belonging to me whatever happens, and I'll look after you as and when I like, whether you're married or whether you're not. Damned if I won't. And heaven help anyone who tries to stop me."

Jill ceased weeping for a moment, and looked at Mark with wide-open eyes. From where had this new Mark Hanson come? It was not the Mark she knew, the semi-abashed, semi-sulking Mark.

She trembled as she stood there. All she could say was, "Oh, leave me alone, Mark!"

"I'm going to leave you alone, now," said Mark. "I have said all I want to, except that for two pins I'd give your Mr. Barbour a thrashing."

Jill made no reply for a full minute, then she walked up to Mark and caught hold of the lapels of his jacket. Her cheeks were stained with tears, and she spoke hoarsely.

"Mark, don't ever be like this to me again," she pleaded.

Mark looked down upon her and wondered at the new beauty which had come to her in her distress. There was a strange light in her eyes, which had he not known otherwise, he might have taken for love.

"Jill," he said with sudden tenderness, "I'll try not to if you'll try not to deserve it."

A little smile, like faint sunshine after rain, came across her face.

Fortunately, Benson, one of the farm hands called at that moment to see her on business concerning some cows, so that she was compelled to dash away to bathe her face and to resume the business of being a farmer.

BARBOUR READS THE NEWS.
There was liveliness at the Kings Arms in Denbigh. Barbour, who had been the cause of much curiosity to its frequenters, had now become a sensation. He had breakfasted before he saw the one and only newspaper, which carried the story of himself. He had noticed a number of strange glances from the people about the hotel, but had attributed them to the fact that everyone knew that he was acquainted with the people at Stone Town.

King's Pardon For Wrong Man

Fine is Returned—His Majesty Signs Free Pardon—Unusual Case

London.—John Salisbury Davies is a farmer of Brynegrw, Denbighshire. Last July he fell foul of the law. He was fined by the Llangollen magistrates.

John Salisbury Davies, who had pleaded guilty, paid. Then the law began to scratch its head. Something wrong about this case.

Investigation. Discovery... the prosecution was due to a misapprehension. Sequel yesterday... British Justice

John Salisbury Davies appeared before the same Bench of magistrates, Alderman Dodd, the chairman, explained the mistake, and proudly presented John Salisbury Davies with a free pardon, signed by the King and the Home Secretary. The fine was returned.

You want to know what John Salisbury Davies was supposed to have done last July? There were two charges of keeping dogs without a licence.

Small beer for a King's pardon... but that's British justice.

The dogs concerned in the case were sheep dogs, for which a farmer or shepherd is granted a free licence. Davies pleaded guilty to keeping the dogs without a licence, but subsequently found that he had applied for the licence before the proceedings were taken.
