Farmers' Information

Swede Roots for Seed

Swede roots for seed may be stored either in outside pits or in a dark, well ventilated cellar free from frost yet sufficiently cool to keep them from sprouting too early in the spring. When the roots are pulled the tops should be cut off about an inch to an inch and a half from the crown.

Protecting Potatoes From Freezing Injury

Losses to potatoes from low temperatures may be prevented by adopting the following measures: (1) Harvest the crop before heavy frosts. (2) Store the crop in rooms having a temperature between 35 and 40 degrees F., thus preventing the potatoes from turning sweet and the development of necrosis. (3) Provide protection against frost for potatoes transported during the cold months. (4) When it is known that potatoes have been undercooled do not handle them until it is certain that the temperature is above the freezing point.

Ploughing Practice

A series of experiments carried out at a government experimental station has given some interesting results in regard to ploughing at different depths and times.

On an average, over a period of nine years, ploughing four inches deep for a rotation of corn, oats, clover and timothy has given higher yields than has ploughing seven inches deep, except in the case of oats, in which the yields have been practically the same. The shallow ploughing is of particular advantage to the corn crop.

In the preparation of sod land for grain, it has been found that ploughing in July, as soon as the hay is off and top working during the summer has not only given higher yields of oats, but has also left the land free from couch grass. The experiment has shown that on sandy loam soil, it does not pay to either rib the land or re-plough in the fall. On heavy clay soil, rubbing or re-ploughing late in the fall gives the frost a chance to mellow the soil and leave it in a better state of tilth.

In the preparation of sod land for corn, manuring on the sod and spring ploughing has given higher yields than manuring and fall ploughing.

It would, therefore, appear that for corn on sandy loam, the land should be manured and spring ploughed four inches deep, while for grain, it should be ploughed as soon as the hay is off and topworked.

RESTRICT HAY EXPORTS

Regulations covering the export of hay and straw, issued by the Department of Agriculture, set up complete machinery to control this business. The government, it is understood, intends to restrict exports only in the Prairie Provinces, where an acute fodder shortage exists, but the regulations cover the whole country. A separate license must be obtained for exports and each licensee will declare precisely how much fodder it covers. Exporters must apply for these licenses to the district inspectors of the department. The inspectors will forward them to Ottawa, along with a report in which the inspectors will make a recommendation. Each application will be decided by the Minister at Ottawa which shipments are restricted or regulated for the U.S.A. a full cargo of Canadian hay, the first in a number of years, left Montreal last week on the freighter Tilthorn bound for south of England. The Tilthorn took 2,000 tons and another ship has been chartered for a subsequent cargo. Drought conditions in South of England open the overseas demand.

SERVICE

SHORT WEIGHTS

The fact that a lot of publicity has been given to the conviction and fining of a number of chain store companies and individuals operating group stores in the Ottawa territory is not going to help them in the eyes of the public or those who are backing the Price Spreads and Mass Buying Enquiry.

Everyone who operates a grocery store knows how difficult it is always to hand out 16 ounces to the pound. A lot depends on the carefulness with which the staff puts up merchandise and considerable also on the shrinkage. There are some who make sure of the correct weights by checking all parcels put up and weighed for more than a week. There may be a legitimate excuse for short weights as long as there are corresponding overweights given, although this may not always satisfy the magistrate trying the case. In the eyes of some the law is the law and nothing can be done about it. But there can be no excuse for any retailer—chain or individual—consistently passing out to the public parcels of goods that are underweight.
