Non-Combatants Paid 7c per hour in Camp

90 miles north of Sault Ste. Marie stands this log camp housing 160 conscientious objectors. The lower picture shows a group of the happy workers. 90 per cent are Mennonites.

On the rugged shores of Lake Superior, 90 miles north of Sault Ste. Marie, is a log camp housing 160 conscientious objectors. These men, 90 per cent of whom are Mennonites, from Western Ontario have been excused from compulsory military training but are employed on the trans-Canada highway under the supervision of the Ontario department of highways. They work eight hours daily, are paid less than seven cents an hour, and appear content. According to C. E. Tench, engineer in charge of the camp, they are "some of the best workers we've ever had."

This "conchie" camp on the Montreal River could be compared to settlements founded by Puritans on the Atlantic seaboard 300 years ago. None of the men smokes, drinks or plays cards. There has been no case of "absent without leave" in the six weeks since the camp started, and the problem of discipline "has never arisen," it was explained.
For many it is their first time away from home, most of them coming from farms in Western Ontario. Later a detachment from Toronto—Stouffville area will be summoned to this camp, so far no objectors have been called to camp from Markham district. The 90-mile bus ride from Sault Ste. Marie to the camp, which included some of the choicest scenery in Canada, would have been classed as "unnecessary pleasure" by heads of families at home.
Army Rations
Standard army rations is the fare of these workers, and the cooking house staff reports "tremendous appetites." There is no canteen or tuck-shop at the camp, but men are free to visit a general store in Montreal River, just across the river from the camp. Hours of work are from eight in morning until noon, and from one to five. After or before work they may fish or hike.
Sleeping quarters are much the same as in army basic training centres, although the double-decker bunks are closer together. Each worker buys his own clothing, but is issued blankets and a pillow. Ordinary tin wash-tubs serve as basins in the abutment huts. Doors and windows in the log buildings are screened, but black flies and mosquitoes are scarce.
