SOUTHERN IRELAND FEARS INVASION

I even suspected that the old thatched cottage that stood directly across the way from the inn could never have attained that appearance of extreme age and yet be so well kept, without being planned that way.

Whether the cottage was old or not, there were plenty of authentic ruins. The ancient stone bridge over the Maigue river had been there for six hundred years or more. No two of its seven arches quite matched the others in size or curvature, though they had stood through the centuries.

Beside the river, just upstream from the bridge, were the ruins of Desmond castle. I liked them best of all. In the library of the inn, I found a book with the plans of the castle, dating back to about 1,100. From inside those walls, many a Fitzgerald or Desmond sallied forth to terrorize the countryside. Enough is left to be able to see all the rooms of the old castle, with the help of Lord Dunsraven's little signs on the wall, and the use of a bit of imagination. One rainy afternoon, I climbed to the top of the tower, looking out through the loop-holes where archers once shot their arrows—and stories like Ivanhoe, that I hadn't read since high school days, came crowding back. I plucked a tiny fern out of a crack in the rock and put it inside an envelope in my pocket. Back home, three weeks later, I found it, all dried out, but when it was planted again, it grew.

There was just one thing in Adare that didn't seem to fit in the picture. That was the manor house itself. It dates back 90 years or so, and looks something like a wedding cake. On the front wall is an inscription which went something like this: "This goodly house was built without selling, or borrowing, or going in debt." And fortunately, I thought, the goodly house is well hidden from view from the rest of Adare.

Ever hailed a scene more softly Perhaps, if you're Irish, you know the poem by Gerald Griffiths:

Following a short program in charge of Rev. P. G. Lehman, she was presented with a gift of money. Then the birthdays of Mrs. Melvin Barkey and Eleanor were celebrated by the group singing "Happy Birthday", while Lillian Shannon presented a beautiful birth day cake made by Edith Hoover.
