From Me to You

The bobbing brown pigtails, with their red bows, and the small dancing feet, stopped suddenly in front of the drug store window. As I turned to enter, the flushed and eager face smiled up into mine, and I stopped to greet my little neighbour. Noting a gleam of silver in one hand, I said brightly, "Ice cream, eh?" As if any little girl, whose mouth was watering for a sundae, would be stopping to weigh the respective merits of bath salts, toilet soap and cologne! With a look which showed a proper estimate of my ignorance, she said:

"It's for a present. Don't you know, Sunday is Mother's Day, Mrs. Brown?"

Then, over looking the stupidity of old ladies, she went on, "Daddy didn't give me this money, he paid me, for sorting potatoes in the cellar."

"Do you like sorting potatoes?" I asked, (bright as ever!)

"No! I don't!" emphatically, "but I like to help my daddy, and I like getting a present for my mother."

This time, the old lady seemed to be able to understand what the little girl meant.

I thought of the incident, when visiting a friend, lately. The clock had got around to that busiest-of-all times in a busy mother's day—children tired from school and play, time for the men to come in to supper, baby to be fed and put to bed, and my hostess's smile a bit tired. In the kitchen, eight-year-old Bobby, hands scrubbed, and freckles burnished, was feeding One-Year-Old his plabum.

"You know," my friend confided, as I was slicing bread in the pantry, "before, Jimmy came, we had such a time with Bob. He would play after school with the boys next door often until supper was over. Punishing him seemed only to make him defiant. Now he is a real help, just when I need him."

Long table set, potatoes on the back of the stove to keep hot, tea kettle singing, that it was time to brew the tea, their mother carried the baby upstairs cooing and waving a chubby hand over her shoulder. I turned to Bob, and asked, innocently, "Do you play ball with the Blank boys as much as you did when I was here before?"

"I do play with them, but I guess not so much now."

"Don't you like games now?"

"Oh sure! But Jim's getting so he catches his ball, if I roll it right into his hands. And I want to do things for my own brother!"

Heavy mist and rain settled down, but when, later in the evening, my husband drove the old car over to fetch me home, his smiling face was as cheery as if the sun shone. "Yes," I thought, "the same old magic works, in any relationship, or circumstance."

This is June, the month of weddings and memories of weddings. In little country churches, decorated with flowers from the gardens of friends; in large city churches, beneath whose vaulted roofs the joyous notes of bridal music soar; in the home living-room, in which gather those most dear; in the solemn quiet of the minister's study;—wherever the place, the brides and grooms, for the most part, are there because they believe they are at the portals of a shining new adventure, with love as the key. And when you think it over, you know they are right. The pity

BEGGING OFF "NO PARKING" TICKET

Cowboy Jack Andrews pleads with Policeman Ed Winterhalter to please have a heart and not present him with a "no parking" ticket that the officer started writing. It all started when Andrews brought his Brahma bull from the rodeo, which is appearing in Pittsburgh, Pa., to visit Mayor Lawrence at city hall. After the visit, the bull, a trifle weary, sat down to rest right under a "no parking" sign. The police officer gave the cowboy a warning not to bring his bull in the "no parking" area again.

of it is, we don't always use the key, and sometimes it gets mislaid, or covered over with cares of everyday living.

The girls of to-day, like the brides of long ago, are willing to leave homes of comfort and security, to go with their husbands even to foreign lands, and among strangers of a foreign tongue, and make the best of it when they get there, because HE would feel badly if they were homesick.

I have seen Betty, who was a city girl, and a school teacher until her marriage, last June. They bought the Johnson place. And has that old house ever had the surprise of its life! For months, it seemed, she was scrubbing and painting and paper hanging and at nights she ached so that John had to put liniment on her back and shoulders—"Absorbine Jr." I suppose! But she wouldn't change places with the Queen.

There is a young farmer who has spent almost every evening for three weeks, after his heavy day's work, in the construction of a miniature lily pool and rock garden, so that his English bride will feel more at home, when she arrives. It is not, ideally, a man job, hauling stones, water, gravel, dirt and mixing cement, building the rockery and setting out the little plants with loving care. Perhaps he thinks it would spoil it, if anyone shared this labour of love.

Smile if you like, but don't we all wish we might command that magic which makes happiness in every day tasks, transmits sacrifice into joy, raises those who possess it, so that toil is sweet, privation and disappointment ignored, and pain, sorrow and death are faced with courage.

Countless mothers, in achieving love's fulfillment, meet the challenge of pain and danger, valiantly and gladly.

There are heads of families, young no longer, daily performing heavy tasks, and meeting difficulties, forgetting themselves in loving service. There are friendships, such as the love which knit together the hearts of David and Jonathon, and the love of Damon and Pythias, each of whom desired to die in place of the other.

If human love can be so transforming, how do we account for the ugly fact that in so many lives it is dwarfed or deformed or perverted beyond recognition? I am not prepared to account for it at all, except to say that it is the misuse and perversion, of the holiest and highest gifts, which do the most harm.

When we apply the power of a living personal love of God to our Christian living, the result it twofold. We possess the secret of a joyous and victorious life. No more need we qualify as the objects of the little boy's prayer, "Please, God, make all the good people nice!" For our desire is to please the One we really love. Secondly, we commend the love of Christ to those around us: defeated, fearful, sorrowing, sin-sick souls are brought to the One, who is altogether lovely. The seed of natural love is planted in each heart without our asking. But it is to those who ask for it, that this greater love is granted. If we ask our Heavenly Father, in child-like trust, it is ours.
