fire to join his Company Headquarters. On arrival he quickly located the Company 300 set which had been damaged by shell fire and endeavoured to re-establish communications in order that the hard pressed Company could call for supporting fire. However, the aerial had been blown from the set. Private Pugh ascertained the approximate area where the signaller had been wounded, and without thought of his own safety crawled forward two hundred yards under intense fire to search for the aerial. Finding the spare aerial he returned quickly, adjusted the aerial, netted the set and re-established communications. By his action it was possible for the Company Commander to call down tank artillery supporting fire which silenced an enemy tank and enabled the Company to move again. Private Pugh's resourcefulness and devotion to duty under fire was an important factor in the success of the Company attack and an inspiration to all ranks of "B" Company.
