June 20th is Father's Day. Before it gets here we expect to see a lot of promotion material about how Dad stands quietly by the unselfish fellow that he is, and allows the credit for all the more honoured human attributes to go to dear old Mom, bless her sentimental heart. We are going to read about the self-effacing man whose days are spent providing the solid but unglamorous background for the brighter members of the family. Between the words will be the implication, "Give the poor man something for Father's Day".

That, we think, is a twisted way to look at it, a sort of upside down view of a very human and normal person. Of course, Dad works hard, he is the family bastion of strength, he has responsibilities, but that is not unusual and we refuse to feel sorry for him. We know he seldom feels sorry for himself. He enjoys life and doesn't make too much fuss about its difficulties. If he doesn't dictate to his family, he at least knows that when it comes to the real showdown his opinion is the one that counts.

Wouldn't it be much better to emphasize how happy we are that he is around just as he is. It would be nice to read more material that presented Father simply as someone we are glad to have, somebody who is wholly normal. When we were young, there was a popular song that expressed this idea exactly. It didn't have the sentimental quality of the recent hit "My Dear Papa" but rather came out with the gusty flavor we find more suitable to this male animal. The title of the song? "What's The Matter With Father — HE'S ALL RIGHT".
