CUSTOM-MADE

BLACKIE UYEDA, a student at the University of Miami, is weaving his way through college. Blackie makes palm leaf hats for men and women and sells them for two dollars apiece. Blackie weaves the hats while his customers wait. Each hat is individually designed. Blackie climbs a palm tree at a hotel in Miami Beach (bottom left), and weaves a hat for a pretty customer (center). Palms are cut by hand. The result (right) is rather stylish. The hats will last a long time if customers apply shellac and paint to them a month after the purchase, according to Blackie.

PAGE BOYS and flower girls took the center of the stage at the wedding of Mary Baillie Hamilton, maid of honor to Queen Elizabeth II, to Adrian Bailey in London. Flower girls (top) loved the attention while the interest of the page boys varied (bottom).

WHAT A WASTE of champagne here as Mrs. Henry Brandli smashes the traditional bottle on the bow of the 38,000-ton tanker, Cradle of Liberty, at the Newport News, Va., shipyards. Larger than many ocean liners, the $9,500,000 tanker is 707 feet in length.

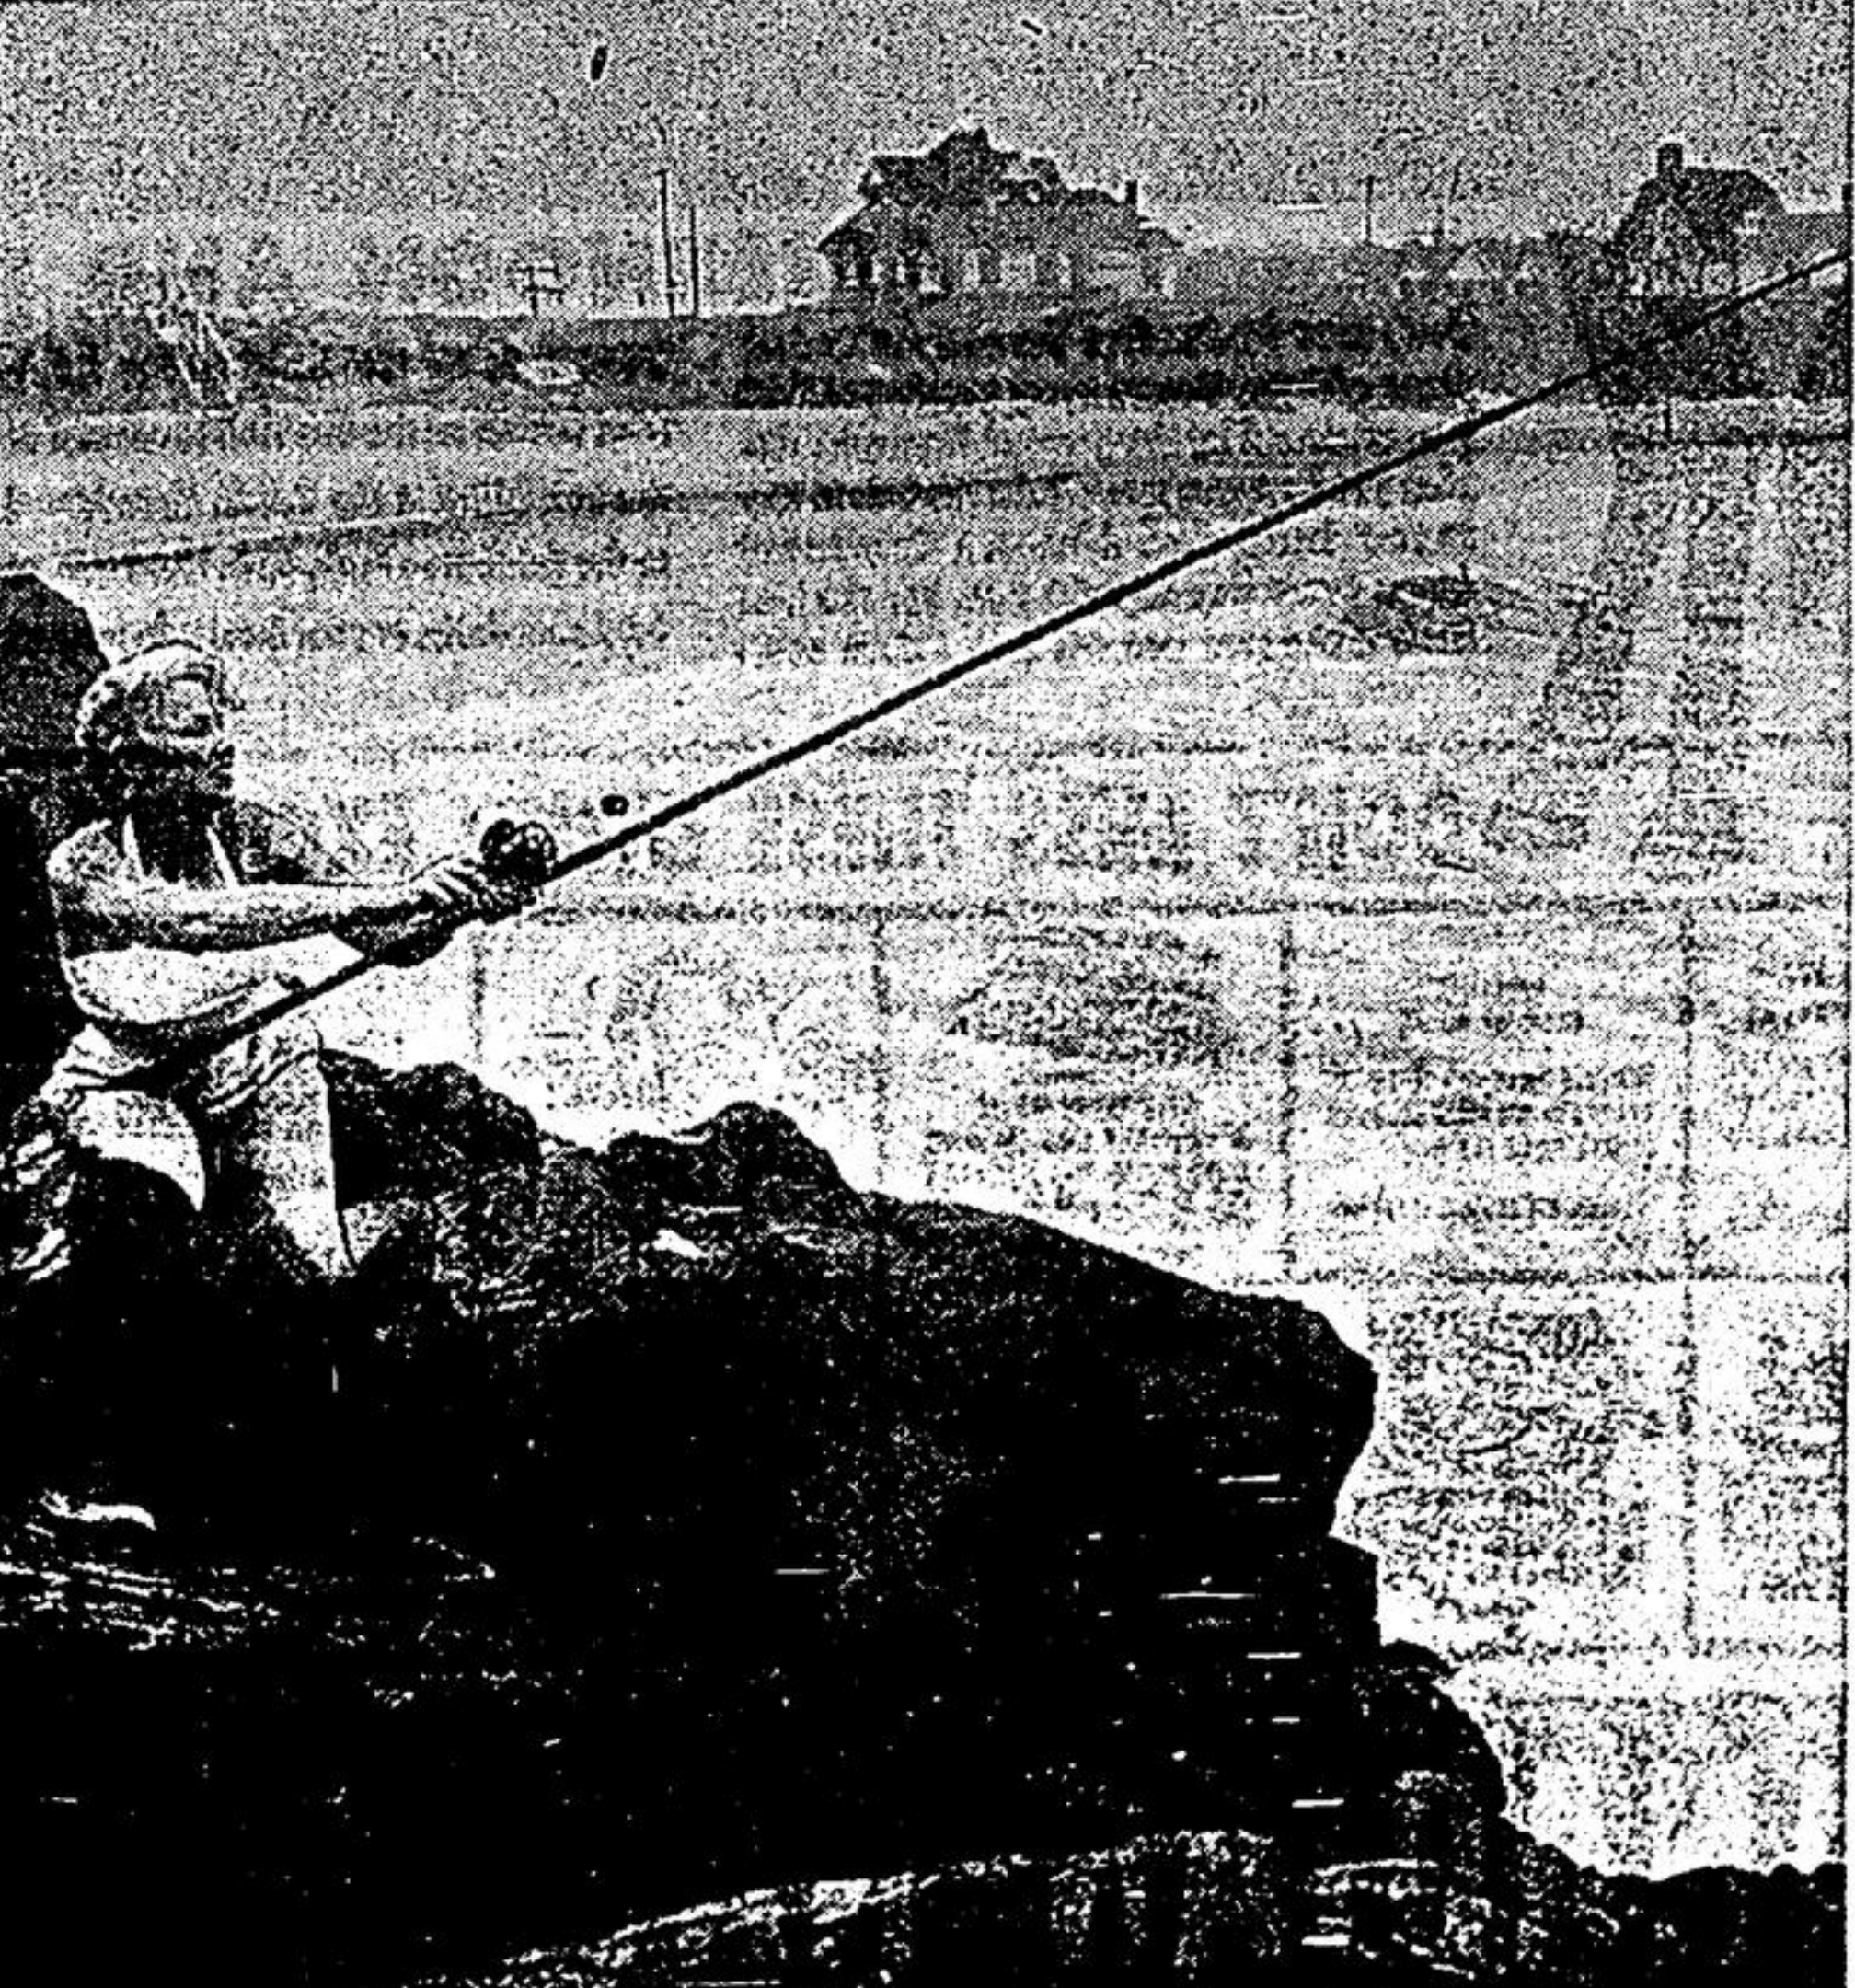

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S grandson, Dwight David, 6, steals the show following a White House ceremony at which he accepted a parade drum from a firm which gave a similar drum to Tad Lincoln when his father was in the White House. Richard Snyder (left), a friend, is watching David.

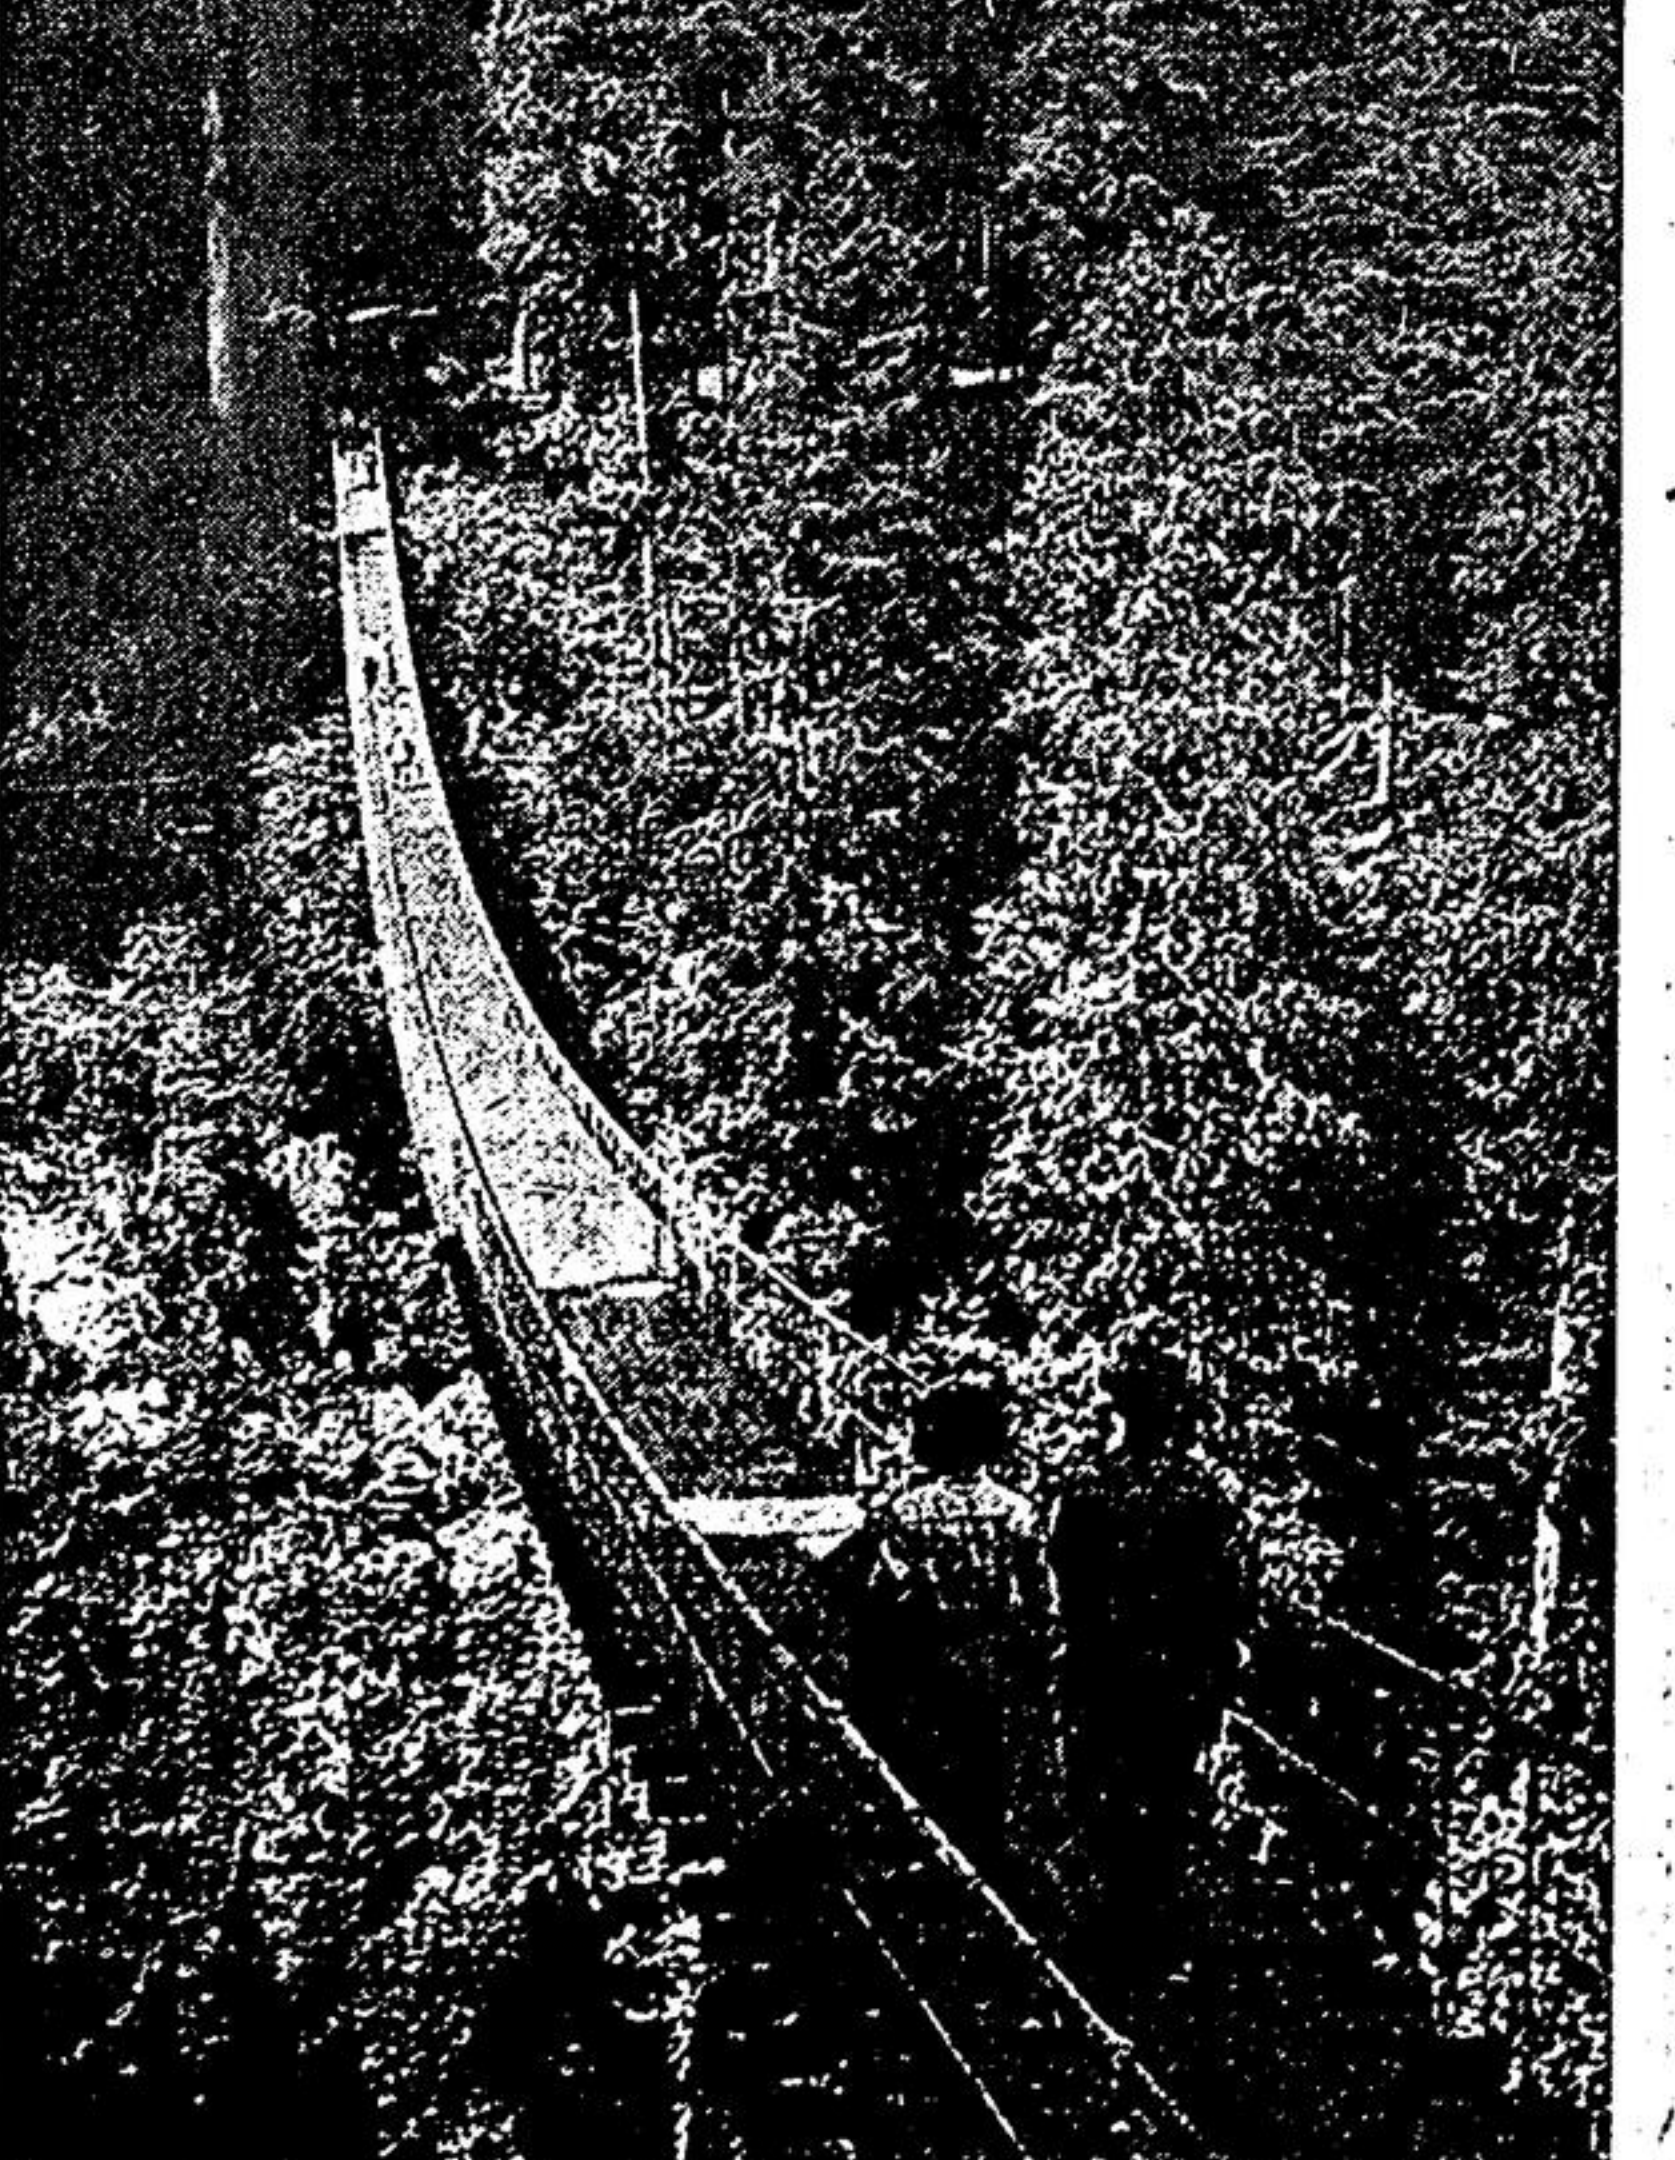

SOME FARMERS may use tractors on their farms but Dean Parker of Brownsville, Vt., still prefers his sturdy oxen. "They are more reliable than those modern gadgets," he says.

ALL TOGGED OUT in peasant costume, Lars Bennheden plays his fiddle with the poise of a veteran while his dad, Martin, accompanies him. Young Lars wasn't upset by the fact that he played for King Gustav in Stockholm.
