Growing Pullets For Egg Production

Several methods of growing pullets have proved satisfactory. Such details as sufficient space in pens and range shelters and plenty of hopper space are, perhaps, more important than the actual method of rearing, providing the birds are reasonably well fed. Pullets are being grown entirely indoors with satisfactory results. The use of shelters on grass range, however, is more popular than confinement rearing with pullets hatched in the spring.

Experimental work indicates that it is not necessary, and may even be harmful, to force the growth and development of pullets with very high protein feeds. On the other hand, severe restriction of feed may be equally harmful. If some feed restriction is practised it is necessary to dispense the feed in measured amounts in troughs or on the ground, since restriction on the basis of length of feeding time is relatively ineffective in retarding feed consumption.

A satisfactory method of rearing pullets with a minimum of labour, is followed at the Canada Department of Agriculture Experimental Station at Fredericton, N.B. The method involves full feeding of mash and grain on ranges, with free access to oyster shell, grit and water. Large, well constructed feed hoppers which require little attention, are used on range. Mash, oats and wheat are fed in separate hoppers, or in separate compartments of each hopper. The birds balance their own ration, and a much larger proportion of grain than mash is usually eaten. The pullets are housed and fed a laying ration before egg production exceeds five percent.
